READ "THE BLACKLISTED MAN," COMPLETE IN NEXT WEEK'S LEDGER

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

VOL. XXXV. NO. 23. CHICAGO, ILL., SATURDAY, JUNE 8, 1907. SINGLE COPIES 5 CENTS.

A DOCTOR'S FATAL LOVE.

By Clive Pemberton.

In a certain home for those of unsound mind—a palatial building, hidden from the eyes of the curious in the midst of a lovely, fragrant, pine wood—a woman lives out her life in passive contentment, undisturbed by the emotions of joy or sorrow. She is still young; time, with his eager, inexorable scythe, has not yet graven one line on the fair, perfect face, and the rippling, abundant hair, like finely spun gold thread, holds not a single silver streak.

Through the long hours of the day the expression on that lovely face never changes from one of pensive sweetness and perfect contentment with a lot in reality painfully monotonous; but sometimes, when the still hours of the night come, and merciful sleep has closed the eyes and brought repose to the tired, vacant minds of the asylum's inmates, a cry bursts forth from the woman as she tosses in dream-haunted sleep—a cry that echoes the memory of her tragedy. Yet she is no trouble to her guardians; the gentle pressure of the watchful attendant's hand on the fair countenance its habitual expression of happiness, and, when morning comes, the empty mind remembers nothing of the dream, and is again calm and untrammeled.

The tragic story of the woman who stands out from the rest of the asylum's unfortunates like a diamond among glass beads has long since been forgotten; but it is, perhaps, the strangest and most pitiful that this world of sunshine and shadow has ever seen.

The name of the woman is Aida Mellerton, and she was just 25 years of age when she came to England from a far off Australian colony. Her father and her mother had died some nine months before in the little town where she was born and had grown up in, and, only waiting until matters, financial and otherwise, were settled, she boarded the first steamer that left for England. With ample means and a beauty of peculiarly fascinating quality, she was not long finding hosts of friends, despite the fact that she landed in England knowing nobody, and possessed of no kith and kin. Her wealth and beauty proved a masterkey powerful enough to open any door, and ere three months had passed, she was launched in the swirl of London society by a lady of title to whom money was the beginning and end of all things earthly.

The success of Aida was instantaneous and complete. Men raved over her beauty in clubs, and, wherever and whenever they came together, women discussed her in parlor and boudoir, and those to whom nature had been unkind envied her with the cold, bitter sneers that a beautiful woman always finds herself the target for. But the colonial beauty passed by sneers and flattery alike, with a cold, flashing indifference. The homage of men she looked upon as her right: the jealousy of women she found an endless source of amusement.

"You must marry well," said Lady Tewkesbury, already making mental calculations as to how much money her protegee's marriage would put in her pocket. "With your lovely face, I think—yes, I am sure—we shall have no difficulty in securing you a title."

"Really?" Aida gave a little thrill of amusement as she ran over in her mind the various scions of noble houses she had seen—for the most part, feeble youths, enervated by fast living and the arduous task of "killing time." "So you think I am eager for that? My dear Lady Tewkesbury, put that out of your mind at once, please. When I marry"—she paused a moment, and a limpid light came into her splendid eyes—"I mean to marry a man. I have not seen a man yet!"

"Do you really mean that?" said her ladyship gravely.

"Certainly I mean it," replied Aida, flashing her a brilliant smile. "Don't you worry about me. When I see the man, I'll point him out to you, and then——" She broke off with an expressive little laugh, at which her ladyship nodded comprehensively.

A few nights later, at a large reception, Aida met the man who instantly struck a new note in her being. He was introduced to her as Professor Bruce Mellerton, and ere they had exchanged half a dozen sentences, she intuitively knew that he was the man to whom she was destined to join her life.

That night as she lay in bed staring into the darkness and conjuring up mental pictures, she wondered what it was about Bruce Mellerton that had so powerfully attracted her. It certainly was not a physical attraction, for the man was a hunchback. Perhaps it was his face—ugly, but powerful with the intellect that burned in the deep-set, gray eyes; for God, in His justice, had endowed the man with a great intellect to compensate for a pitiful, stunted frame.

Curiously, too, he felt a new stirring of the emotions in the first moment of that meeting with Aida. He had battled through life alone, giving no thought to winning a woman to share his triumphs in the world of science; but, now, at the age of forty-five, he felt a mysterious moving of the whole man within himself, responding to those in another. He found himself frequenting places and attending functions he would never have given even a passing thought to before he met her; and she—she read his feelings long before his cold, formal exterior unbent to the warmer bond of friendship.

There is little need to dwell upon this part of the story. Within six months of their first meeting Bruce Mellerton and Aida were man and wife, and went away from London into the wilds of Derbyshire to live their lives together—all in all to each other.

For two years that life was ideal. On his leaving with Bruce Mellerton lavished upon all the love his strong, hitherto "unawakened nature was capable of; she, in her turn, was equally devoted to him. but less demonstrative in her manner of showing her affection.

It was in the beginning of their third married year that the first rift came. About some time Aida had complained of violent headaches, which utterly prostrated her, and which had, on one occasion, spent itself in a hysterical fit of alarming violence. It distressed her husband greatly, and for some time he had spent many hours in solitude, working at a series of lectures he delivered in London, and, in consequence, Aida's distressing phase of health had escaped him, for she had always concealed it. He left his study one night—whither he had gone immediately after dinner—about eleven o'clock, and, to his surprise, found Aida on the sofa in the parlor.

"Aida!" she cried, shuffling into the room, with his usual ungainly tread. "My dear, what do you do in here?"

He stepped sharply back as she suddenly sprang up, and, drawing herself to her full height, looked down on him with blazing eyes. She did not speak and he gently touched the flushed cheek.

"Aida!" he said softly, "are you ill?"

"What do you mean?" she cried, her usually musical voice sounding a shrill treble; "my head is bad—can I not sit on the sofa?"

He stood silent for a moment—almost petrified with amazement.

"Aida—my dearest," he faltered, hurt and distressed by her irritation, "what is the matter? What have I done that you should speak to me so—I, who hold only one thought —your comfort and happiness?"

The strange passion died out of her face with the swiftness of a passing lightning flash, and, suddenly stooping, she threw her arms about him and kissed him with a sensation almost wildly.

"Forgive me, dear," she said, pressing her head to his, "my head feels so strange, and, for the moment, I did not quite know what I was doing."

He looked at her long and anxiously.

"You shall see a doctor about it—another day perhaps," he said firmly. "Why didn't you tell me of this before?"

"I did not want to worry you," she replied, regarding him with a slow, enigmatical smile. "It does not seem so much, and why should you be worried with such a trivial matter as a headache? Are you let us?" And she was quite well in the morning."

She strayed slightly as she moved to the door, and, strangely perturbed, he followed her, soberly thoughtful. On the stairs, however, memory Aida awoke with her headache gone and all her full-spirited nature shut out from the mind held to his determination of the previous night, and immediately after breakfast Bruce Mellerton and returned with the best doctor the primitive place boasted. But, though, reminded of pride which he could not restrain, the professor ushered the doctor into the presence of his wife, and formally introducing him as "Doctor Murray Peploe," left them together.

There is little to hint of the tragedy fate held in the future for them that sunny morning. Aida quietly told the physician the trouble with her head, and he listened with professional attention and sympathy. Having put the usual questions, he took out his stethoscope and made a brief examination of her heart. She studied his face thoughtfully as he did so—the clear dark eyes and regular features impressed her favorably, and when he went away after a reassuring diagnosis, and she had the feeling that his visit was useless, would not be unpleasant to her.

He came in the following day; again two days later; and then again and again on the separate occasions during the month. He was always genial always sympathetic, but quite professionally so—and she found a peculiar fascination in the interest shown to him—something she was beginning to feel almost necessary to her every day. She made up her wavering mind suddenly on the day that he announced his intention of not calling again.

"I don't think your headaches will return again, Mrs. Mellerton," he said shortly, "but if they do——"

"I shall ask you to come again," she interposed, as he hesitated. She looked at him strangely, then spoke again.

"Doctor Peploe, I have something to ask you—to consult you about." He had reached the door ere the hesitating words were quite spoken, but he turned sharply back, a foolish, insane idea flashing through his brain that she had read his carefully guarded secret.

"What is it, my dear Mrs. Mellerton?" he said softly. "You are troubled about something—I can see by your face that something has been worrying you for some time."

He sat down beside her, and, bending forward looked into her deep eyes. She twisted the rings on her fingers nervously.

"It is something about myself—my health that I want to speak to you of," she went on gravely. "You will keep my confidence?"

"Need you ask?" he replied in a low voice. "I trust it will be in my power to remove the cause that is troubling you."

"It seems so foolish—so trivial now that I am about to speak of it," she said thoughtfully; "but the feeling grows stronger and stronger, and I can keep it to myself no longer, Doctor Peploe," she went on, with almost frantic haste, "three weeks ago I began to have strange, inexplicable feeling of dislike for Bruce—my husband. Day by day it grew stronger and stronger, and now I feel that I almost hate him! Tell me what it means—tell me what it means, for Heaven's sake!"

She fixed her dilated eyes on his for a space, then dropped her head, face in her hands, and he—he sat there silent, battling with the myriad thoughts that coursed like fire through his brain. Then, suddenly like a blast of ice-cold air, the truth thundered on him—and he nearly fainted sick. He knew now that the look in her eyes and the ever-changing emotions she had of late given vent to were the first outward signs of the madness which she had inherited from a maniac father, and which was now burrowing into the hitherto healthy brain cells.

Had the man been pure-minded and approached the discovery in the right spirit, he would have been alarmed and this story never written; but his baser passions leaped to the call—his unrecognized desires responded greedily to the chance offered, and he kept to the deliberate working of a scheme which had already begun to formulate in his mind during this fiendish moment of silence he had spoken. And she—she, Heaven help her—had no power to tell him, no whisper to warn her of the perilous brink toward which she was helplessly drifting—as helpless as the fragment of wreckage on the tumbling surface of the ocean.

She turned at last, and, removing her hands from her face, looked at him.

"Aida," he said softly, "Aida!"

He started at the first sound of her name from his lips, for she answered very slowly—he could see—and with a faint smile parting her lips. The next moment his senses were all but lost, for she was pouring the words into her ears.

"My love! My love!" he murmured, his voice trembling as he noted how passively she lay in his arms. "Do you not know—cannot you guess when I tell you of those feelings you have told me of? Cannot you tell yourself that I love you—love you another—one who loves you too much for it not to be returned?"

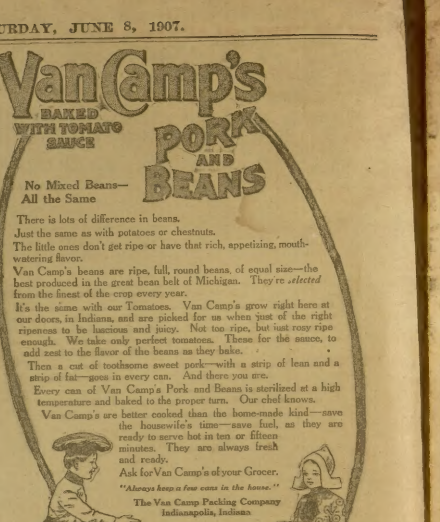
She lay in his arms, her eyes smiling into his, her ears drinking in every word as they fell from his lips, her whole attitude the slow filtering of water through a resisting sponge. She was equally unaware of the fact that his man whose strong arms held her so tightly, and whose eyes seemed to burn into her soul, was the man she loved him! She knew it now; she had loved him from the first moment she met him—loved him only.

And her husband? A cunning look came into her face as she suddenly received a strange thought. She had told Murray Peploe that she had a husband before she told that she hated him, and yet—and yet she had loved him once. Or had she? Memory seemed that she loved him! Was it possible that she ever could have loved that unlovable man—so much unlovable?

That night commenced a new era in the lives of those two. Through the mad working of the brain had fascinated the man from the commencement of his acquaintance with Aida—the theories widely differing from other authorities—on the arrest and suspicion of incipient insanity. On the man himself, physically perfect and organically sound, the theory would be a terrible shock—a stupendous sorrow or overwhelming joy—would arrest the decay of the brain, and prevent the growth and development of complete insanity. And now, by a chance such as comes but once in a lifetime, in his time, he had a subject. And apart from the professional side, he formulated in his mind a plan to test to his theory. If by a sudden shock—by the death of her husband—he could bring her to himself, secure her for himself at the same time? They say that in love all is fair, and Aida, he is the most dangerous of all. Hitherto, the criminal instinct within Murray Peploe had never been aroused, but now, with the devil whispering a plan in his ear, he bent his faculties to the one thought—that of removing of the obstacle to his desires.

Night after night he sat in his room, thinking, thinking of a plan by which he could accomplish the two things—secure to himself the woman he loved, and her fortune for himself. And fate—mysterious, paradoxical fate—arranged the scene and the part for him to easy. For the first time in his life Bruce Mellerton fell ill. It was only a brain fever, a breaking down temporarily of the overworked nerves—but it came to Murray Peploe's ears that Bruce Mellerton was at hand, only waiting for him to put into execution. During long hours of consideration he struggled against the temptation, and probably had there been the slightest hint that he intended to carry it; but the avenue of safety was complete, and its completeness spelled Bruce Mellerton's doom.

He stood looking down on the man he had killed as surely as if he had driven a knife into his heart. It had been so simple—so terribly simple—that he could hardly realize quite that he had caressed the Rubicon and was branded with the mark of Cain.



Van Camp's
BAKED
WITH TOMATO SAUCE
PORK
AND BEANS
No Mixed Beans—
All the Same
There is lots of difference in beans.
Just the same as with potatoes or chestnuts.
The little ones don't get ripe or have that rich, appetizing, mouth-watering flavor.
Van Camp's beans are ripe, full, round beans, of equal size—the best produced in the great bean belt of Michigan. They're selected from the finest of the crop every year.
It's the same with our Tomatoes. Van Camp's grow right here at our doors, in Indiana, and are picked for us when just of the right ripeness to be luscious and juicy—but not over ripe, but just rosy ripe enough. Then only perfect tomatoes. These for the sauce, to add zest to the flavor of the beans as they bake.
Then a cut of toothsome sweet pork—with a strip of lean and a strip of fat—goes in every can. And there you are.
Every can of Van Camp's Pork and Beans is sterilized at a high temperature and baked to the proper turn. Our chefs know.
Van Camp's are better cooked than the home-made kind—save the housewife's time—save fuel, as they are ready to serve hot in ten or fifteen minutes. They are always fresh and ready.
Ask for Van Camp's of your Grocer.
"Always keep a few cans in the house."
The Van Camp Packing Company
Indianapolis, Indiana

He had just made the tiniest incision with a slender surgical knife in the dead man's thigh, and without a struggle or a murmur, Bruce Mellerton's life had ebbed quickly away. For a space he stood silent, looking down on the still, placid face of the man whose life he had taken. He was safe—perfectly safe—he kept repeating to himself. If the whole college of surgeons examined the body, they would all unhesitatingly declare that Bruce Mellerton had died through the bursting of the small vein in the groin of the main drains of the circulatory system. He moved to the door at last, turning his head as he went, to look for the last time at the knife that lay on the small table by the bed.

Now the second test—the greatest of all. Midway down the stairs he paused and listened. The faint strains of the piano in the parlor came trembling on the air toward him; then Aida's voice, singing a low, plaintive song.

Bracing up his nerves, he descended the stairs, and, turning the handle of the parlor door, entered the room.

She was seated at the piano, singing softly to herself and he was standing beside her before she turned her head and looked at him with a calm smile. The blood left his cheek as he looked into her flashing eyes; then it surged out from their depths, flaming now and unmistakable.

"Well!" she said, still letting her hands glide lightly over the keys. "How late you're sleeping—very soundly!"

"Yes?" he replied, and his voice sounded strange and unreal in his own ears; "he is sleeping—very soundly!"

"He!" she exclaimed in surprise. "Who?"

The moment had come; with his eyes full on hers, he said it.

"Bruce is dead forever, Aida," he said slowly. "He will never wake again. He is dead!"

Her hands fell with a loud crash on the keys, and her eyes dilated until they seemed to fill her face. For a long while there was silence, then she slowly looked at him and laughed softly. His blood froze as he looked at her smiling lips and heard her laughter.

"So you have killed him?" she said musingly. "I wondered if you would!"

She began to strike the notes of the piano with one finger at random, her head inclined and a low laugh escaping her now and again. And he—he stood rigid and horrified, watching and listening to her. Like the screaming of a thousand mocking, mocking voices it was crashing upon him that she, escaping from the bonds of her reason was already tottering, and would soon be gone forever. And he—he had helped to unbalance it. He could have screamed with the writhing agony of remorse and a sudden fear that had gripped him as she spoke. She knew he had killed Bruce Mellerton. Would she accuse him of it before everybody?

She suddenly sprang to her feet and faced him.

"I will go and see him," she said, gliding to the door. "I must see Bruce asleep," and as she went from the room he heard her laugh again. Up and down the softly lighted room he paced, his heart beating like a piston-rod, his hands clenched until the nails sank into the flesh. In the room above—the death-chamber now!—he heard a footstep cross the floor; then all was silent, save for his hoarse breathing.

The minutes flew by, but still the silence was unbroken. He could stay there alone no longer; he must follow her and see what she was doing.

With the stealth of a thief in the night he crept up the stairs, and stood at last outside the chamber door. His heart leaped as he heard a muttering within, and the nausea of horror seized him as she laughed again—a terrible laugh that reached a deranged mind. And, suddenly, with startling clearness, he heard her speaking as she stood over the dead man.

"Bruce! My darling taken from me. That devil, Murray Peploe, has done it! And nobody will ever know."

His stricken suddenly left him, and he fled from the sound of that muttering voice, and reached the parlor again. And there he sat and waited, while the hours dragged by, and no sound came to disturb the uncanny silence.

At last it was broken. He heard her cross the floor above; the door of the room was flung open, and then she came into the room. She came straight up to him, and put her soft arms around his neck.

"He is dead, Murray," she said softly; "he will not be able to trouble us now. Aren't you glad?"

She was leaning over the back of his chair, and her eyes looked into his. They were almost same at that moment, and for an instant hope surged through him that he had been mistaken, but only for an instant, for that shock had restored her reason. He caught at the little jeweled hand that caressed his hair, and, as he did so, she withdrew the other arm, and there was silence between them for a space, while he battled with a new feeling of impending doom that must have existed in the agony of death itself, he realized that he could feel that fair arm encircled his neck in such a manner that he felt a receiving of the cold, glittering of steel band.

He looked up into her eyes and he knew then that he was doomed. They glared at him with the light of a million mad passions and hatred behind them, and there was the triumphant look of vengeance at hand, a receiving of retribution.

He felt her other arm move, then it swung round into his vision, and he saw that the tiny jeweled hand gripped his surgical knife, which he had left on the table by the bed. It was poised for a second in the air above him, then, with relentless force and unswerving aim, it plunged into his neck, immediately over the jugular vein. A wild laugh leaped from her lips as she withdrew it, and flung it far from her, then silence fell in the room, save for the distant sounds of sudden alarm.

She was holding the dead man in her arms and crooning a song into his soundless ears when they burst the locked door and found her. The light of reason had fled forever from her eyes, and, in merciful contentment and forgetfulness, two days later they took her to her final home amid the pines.

TWO FACES UNDER ONE HAT.

By H. E. SCOTT.

Author of "The Pretty Typewriters," "The Girl from Nacoupin," etc.

[Copyright by the Author.]

Begun in No. 11, May 18. Subscriptions can begin with that issue, or back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER X.
BEHIND THE BARS.

"What is this?" exclaimed Sheriff Root, a large, florid-faced, sandy-bearded man, who stood smoking his pipe in front of the courthouse as the two buggies drove up and halted before him. "Oh, you, Cleaver, and—why, how excited you look! What's up?"

"There has been a most damnable murder committed, Sheriff Root! The poor victim lies out at Sandy Run—Ned Driscol is guarding the body until the coroner arrives. Here is the murderer. He was caught in the very act. Take charge of him. You have seen him before, Mark Perry is his name."

"Murder! The Lord help us! And this lad is the murderer? Mark, I would not have believed it."

"You must not now, Sheriff Root. This man's charge is false. The murdered man was my friend. Oh, no way of escape. Here is the firm's card. Mr. Horton will come at once. Poor, poor man, and to find his end in this horrible manner! Sheriff Root, this partner's murderer!"

"Mark Perry! Is that so, Mark?"

"And, and—oh, God! must it be!" With this cry of agony he fell into a betrothed and her father? Tell them!"

"I shall know what to tell them, Mark, and I shall believe in your integrity. I will see you at the latest in the morning. Good-bye, and don't worry, Cleaver."

"I also will call there," said Caleb, "and I will make it convenient for me to do so. I can. Your tale may be true, after all; but you looked so guilty, as you stood there, that I am inclined to think you are not. You have sealed your own doom. Keep back, keep back!"

"Oh, my God, man!" groaned Mark. "you heard not all the words I uttered in my agony."

"I heard enough—quite enough to do for you, and it's evidence, competent evidence!"

"Unfortunate wretch, that I am! The words I uttered have all appearances that I am a murderer! Did you not hear the brief words of my confession?"

"Too late for amendments now, you bloody criminal! I was at first deceived by your seeming grief, but now you nowguilt is written all over you."

"Monster! Have you no soul?"

"Oh, I'll leave you fast enough," said the jailer as he locked the door behind the door.

Having reached it, he swung it open and glanced hastily out. "Look here," he said quickly, "I'll do a poor man's duty. Money is a power. Have you been searched?"

"No. I—I—but what do you wish to search me?"

"Why, the sheriff will probably do that later; but if you have not been searched, you have money."

"Yes, yes; but what do you mean?"

"Mean? Don't I say that I am a poor man and that money is power? How much did you say the body cost?"

"Fiend!" exclaimed Mark; "I am an innocent man! The murdered man was my friend. I would have died willingly could I have but saved his life! I had over six hundred dollars in my pocket when with a joyous heart beating in my bosom I left Elwood expecting to meet him in Coulton. He—he—oh, God! he—he—he lay dead, cold hard, a good haul; but you are in luck. It will cost you but a very good. Now what! Look here, you are young yet, and what you want to do freedom. Let me go, and I'll be over and you are held by the jury I will get orders to keep you in irons, at least put you into your cell. I would not like to take chance then. If you are ever a free man again in these rooms, you will. I will be fair with you, I won't take all—for five hundred dollars I will fix a way for you to escape tonight."

"With the hundred you have left you can get away and live in fine shape. I'll even furnish you with a disguise. It must be at midnight."

"Infamous scoundrel! You, the county jailer, make that proposition to an innocent man! I shall inform the sheriff of your treachery—I would die first!"

"Then, as a man, die like the gutlows! As for your informing the sheriff—am I dumb? I will say you're mad that you offered me every dollar in your possession if I would let you escape at midnight. I am no novice in this business, young fellow, and I alone can save your life."

"Hold me to account? Fool! Within three months your lifeless body will be hanging from the gallows! Do you think I would have made you that proposition were there a single chance for your escape? Don't you know that my evidence alone will hang you?"

"I will denounce you in open court!"

"Denounce and be damned! That for your denouncing!" and Dobbins snapped his fingers viciously.

"Well, your words on me are wasted. Even now the real criminal may have been apprehended. If otherwise, conscious of

(Continued on page six.)

"Mark Perry!" exclaimed both Marks and Cleaver, who had recognized him.

"Yes, friends," sobbed Mark, "but go, go! The life of an innocent man depends on your ability to ferret out the murderer of my dear friend."

"You will send the coroner out, sheriff?" asked Cleaver, as the three men turned away.

"At once and use the telegraph wires. Come, Mark, I must be at the depot when the train arrives. I shall have barely time."

"Where, sheriff?"

"To jail, lad, to jail! I have no discretion in this matter."

Mark's face worked convulsively as he grasped "Jail! jail!"

"Come, be brave, Mark," said the doctor. Under the charge of murder you could expect nothing but to be locked up—no admissible. But rest assured that I am your friend. I have had a long experience, and will leave no stone unturned to establish it. Be brave, then, and tell your tale on

By WILLIAM H. MANNING.

THE TREASURE BEARERS;

Or THE HAWK OF THE FURLAND.

[Copyright by W. D. Boyce Co.]

Begun in No. 20, May 18. Subscriptions can begin with that issue, or back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER XIII.
TREACHERY.

It was a seemingly small circumstance which awakened Roger's suspicions. The message said that the Express commander would wait for the Oakley contingent. Severn had never heard of a brigade of the Hudson's Bay Fur Company, delaying its onward course for an outsider, and, moreover, it was well understood that the Oakley brigade, on each and every journey, must keep up with the leader or not have its companionship. No obligations rested on the Express.

The servants of the Imperial Company were supposed to loiter for neither storm, stress nor mob.

Severn read the message through more than once, and with careful meditation. If was in favor of its reliability that no word from Alexis Michel had been found on the point. After all, the whole matter might be open and aboveboard.

One thought led him to decide that, in any case, he must learn whether his other boat was cast away as alleged. He referred to his followers.

"Who knows where Spur Island is?" he asked.

"I do," replied Baptiste Proue.

"And where is it?"

"Half a mile from where we were driven ashore."

Roger read the message aloud, covertly watching Korway as he did so. That person was impassive. Severn and the other voyageurs who were open to doubt gave no sign of duplicity, but there were plenty of comments on Michel's alleged mishap that seemed innocent and natural.

Finally, there was the decision. Action was the second boat was imperative, and it must be learned whether Alexis was cast away as the message said. Severn reentered the boat, its bow was turned south, and then the return was begun.

The voyageurs still talked about Alexis Michel's mishap, and Korway added an occasional remark, but Roger said nothing. Necessity drove him back to the relief of his comrades, but his heart was not in the work.

He could not banish the fear that something was wrong.

Filled with these doubts he meditated on the message, and now and then gave a secret look at Korway. He might as well have tried to read a sphinx. Whatever his feelings, that man was usually master of his expression.

The day was well spent when Baptiste Proue pointed ahead and announced that Spur Island was in sight. It was higher than the average of the islands in Lake of the Woods, and rough and rocky. Being somewhat off the way usually taken by boats, it was new to all the voyageurs except Baptiste—if they told the truth.

A rocky, serrated ridge extended along the west side, yet it was there that Baptiste advised landing. A miniature harbor could be found by doing as he suggested, and it was the only good place of going ashore.

Roger's fears did not abate at sight of the island. Where were the wrecked men? Why was there no sign from them? True, view was obstructed by the ridge, but he would have expected that some sort of a signal would be flying on an elevated point, and that men would be near it, watching for relief.

Oppressed by these growing doubts, the partisan did not obey his plans. The search must be made. Possibly Alexis had found a way of leaving the island, and some message might be discovered there making all plain.

As they neared the land and Roger surveyed his dubious crew, the fear increased in his mind that this opportunity—when his aides were absent—might be seized to make open rebellion. Perhaps an attack would follow. He decided to block this possibility.

"Only one man is needed with me," the partisan quietly said. "Korway, you have a quick eye. Will you go with me?"

The expected demur did not arise with alacrity.

"At your service," he replied readily. "Maybe packing will be in order, and you all know how cunning I am with the tumpline."

The jest brought forth a general laugh, and Baptiste himself smiled as if his mind was as sunny as the day.

"We will not be gone long," added Roger. "Baptiste, keep her where she is, and be ready to spread the sail anew."

He landed and Korway followed.

"A pretty bit of tangle," said Peter lightly. "Rock, bush, tree, gully and upheaval. Here's a chance to show what we can do at climbing. Two to one I beat you going up, partisan!"

"We will make our race when we are down, and let the boat do it. Still, I am willing to make good speed."

They ascended with no great difficulty, but found their view still cut off. A second ridge lay parallel with the first, and the main part of the island was still invisible. They crossed the intervening depression, and the view was gained. Two-thirds of the land lay revealed to sight, and the eastern shore was wholly open to examination.

Nothing was to be seen of Alexis and his men.

"Well, they are not very active," remarked Korway.

"Can they have got away?" asked Roger, unconsciously thinking aloud.

"It is possible, but there is ground to the north that we can't see, and, Baptiste to the contrary, it seems to me there is a little bay there."

"I don't detect it. A cape puts out there, but the presence of a bay is doubtful. Still, we must see to it. We will walk that way."

"Suppose you take one ridge and I the other?"

This was something Severn would not consent to—he intended to keep Peter close to himself.

"We have a good view from here," he responded. "Let us go as we are. Do you look west and I will scan the east calm."

They went on rapidly. Roger watched keenly for signs of the alleged castaways. Once, while doing this, he changed to turn suddenly and look at his companion. Peter was gazing in a right and left fashion and certainly was on the alert, but his expression startled the partisan. It was a grim, speculative, unwholesome expression, and suggestive of something smacking of mischief.

After that he kept close, to his associate. Once he glanced back at the boat and men, and was rewarded by a quick glance that was fleeting as a flash of light.

A few rods farther they went, and then, as Roger surveyed the eastern shore, there came a cry which, to the startling, craftsound, and he wheeled about. Korway was invisible.

Severn ran to where he had last seen him.

At that point the ridge ended in a sheer descent o fifteen feet. The upper edge had been broken away, and at the base a great floundering in a mass of earth and bushes that had gone down with him. While the partisan looked, to see it serious harm had resulted from the rapid his feet and looked for the author.

He smiled grimly.

"If I die with a broken neck a fall on this ridge will not cause it," he said rather cheerfully. "That has been proved."

"Are you unhurt?"

"Sound as rock. Keep away from the brink—it we, going too near thus dropped Korway must be a treacherous villain."

"Can you climb up?"

"Couldn't do it if I were a cat. The earth won't hold. I shall have to keep along until we reach the best place."

Roger did not demur, believing that he could watch Korway in the depression, he accepted the estimate, and they went on. Ten rods farther a pillar-like rock and mass of thick cedar barred Roger's way. He made a circuit as quickly as the brush would permit, came again to the verge and looked for Korway.

That person was not visible.

Severn glanced both ways. The way was open enough, but seemed to be wholly alone. He grew alarmed.

"Korway!" he shouted.

There was no reply. The wind moaned and swept the trees, but no other sound.

Again apprehensions of treachery assailed the partisan, and he gazed swiftly around him. He saw neither Peter nor Alexis, and the question was whether he had been foiled.

For a moment he meditated leaping into the chasm, but a glance showed that, for all of twenty feet, and at the foot was a bed of ugly pointed rocks. Instead, he retraced his steps a few rods farther before climbing he could have had a smooth, easy course.

This occurred to him—and something more? Korway had disappeared mysteriously. Had he made use of this gap?

The walls of the intersection were dangerously steep, but a few rods farther Roger caught at these, lowered himself recklessly, reached the foot and then ran back toward the beach. It was not far to go. He soon emerged from cover and was where he could see all the shore and a wide stretch of lake.

He saw something more. His own boat was afloat, and receding from land with the next set and bellying widely. The craft was rapidly receding from land. More than this, Peter Korway was in the boat and sitting in the steersman's position.

It had been no groundless fear of Severn's that treachery was afoot. He was deserted on the island.

CHAPTER XIV.
KORWAY TAKES COMMAND.

Those who knew Severn had left in the boat had experienced unusual fortunes. Not long had Roger and Korway been gone when the craft commenced rocking violently, the water heaved strongly, and a keen gust of wind swept down upon them. This called attention to the sky, and each voyageur realized that a squall was impending.

Their orders were to stay in the boat, and they stayed, but its motion increased every instant and grew dangerous. The oars were used to keep her off the beach, but even this device became fair to fail presently. There was danger in that every-day steering would soon be tearing over the lake.

Long the waiting party scanned the summit of the ridge.

"Why don't they come back?" David Ridley asked anxiously.

"Neither they come soon or we shall be flung ashore," declared Baptiste Proue almost as seriously. "We can't long keep off the beach."

Just then a fiercer gust swept upon them, and the boat was forced farther out—so shallow that she almost touched bottom.

"Pole hard!" shouted Baptiste. "Keep her afloat! What shall we do, anyhow?"

"Why don't they come?" repeated David. "Look! Korway is in the boat!"

The action of the wind and waves had forced the craft northward until it lay opposite to where appeared in view a stretch of the ridge. Now, through this gap a man was running excitedly. It was Peter Korway. He dashed across the beach, plunged into the water and gained the boat—where the wind was heaving against the poles. Then he leaped within.

Baptiste Proue at the steersman's oar could laid hold of the rudder lever.

He was puzzled and appeared to be wholly out of breath.

"Get away or you will be wrecked!" he ordered. "Quick! Baptiste, help us pole sheer off coast and run with the wind. You are to take Roger's place. Where is the other cape?"

He pointed to the tongue of land at the northern end of the island.

Louis Gouin and several of the other voyageurs called to Baptiste Proue and Louis Chardonnais sat idle and looked at Peter Korway.

"If we are to put off," cried Helen excitedly, "why does not Captain Severn come with you?"

"He could not get here in time," replied Korway promptly.

"Then why does he not appear and give his own orders?"

"Unfortunately, Master Campbell," responded Peter, with seeming frankness, "he is cut off by a deep chasm—far worse than that yonder. He can't get here in time to save the boat from being swept, but he can get to the cape. Quick, men!—pole hard, or we shall be swamped. The freight must be on board also for some time. Every piece would be lost."

There was indeed, been a narrow escape from the mishap he mentioned, and the case was plausible.

Helen and David looked at the ridge and prayed for Roger's return. They feared a ruse, they feared another place, and feared, and yet all of Peter's statements looked reasonable, and the need of putting off was imperative.

A new wave came tumbling in-shore and Helen, alarmed for her guards, was hurry out into the water. Michel Pera caught her by the arm. Gouin and Monsieur Burke, who was unusually excited, fixed his staff in her coat and pulled hard. Between them and dog, and her assertions, she was brought back safely, but this mishap decided Peter.

Wreck must not be made there.

"Off!" he shouted.

He did not see how a sail was to be used then, for the wind was strong, but he was a landsman, and was now not like that which had lashed Lake of the Woods two years before, and the boatmen voyageurs knew how to carry canvas under difficulties.

In a very short time the boat was speeding up-shore like a frightened bird, the men watching over her poles, and Peter Korway steering with a practiced hand. The size of the island enabled them to reach a point off the promontory in short order, and then Helen and David looked hard for Roger Severn.

Korway brought the boat around the point skillfully, and, as they passed the point that formed the region, they had, at last, view of the very place where the partisan would naturally be looked for as he waited for them.

But he was not there.

Something else was. As they came around the wind caught them with additional force and they heeled up and got over that even the voyageurs shifted with some uneasiness. Only Peter was calm. He did not even look at the sail, though sail and mast were alike endangered; but steered with as much composure as if the lake was a rippling pond.

Under his hand they went shooting away from land.

"Stop, stop!" shouted David wildly.

"We can't!" returned Korway steadily. "But, Severn, man, Severn!"

"We will pick him up soon."

"I tell you to do it now. Down with that sail, put back and get our leader!"

"We can't. No boat can ride against this wind. We should be swamped."

Helen had been silent. Once she made a motion to draw her pistol, but her hand remained on the weapon, but she was not sure of her position. She had sailed in storms before, then, but this emergency was new to her, and she was deeply sensible of the fact that they were already in peril, and would be worse off if they tried to make land.

She glanced at Baptiste Proue, but he shook his head gloomily. He did not like the looks of matters, and, hot-blooded and loyal, he would, at a word from Helen or David, have drawn his weapons and fought the opposition even in that heavy craft, but that was all he saw very clear to do.

The point could not be made then. He realized that fact. And his sober signal said as much to Helen and David.

Fate had turned strangely against Roger Severn. Dangerous from the first, he had shown his sagacity and prudence by keeping his men under his eye when he went ashore. That seemed to insure his success, but fate played its game and threw every chance in Korway's favor.

His fall from the top of the cliff had been a genuine accident, but it changed everything there. He knew the island and knew of the diagonal gap in the outer ridge, which, if it were used, would bring him from Roger's sight. Even then, only the most careful look from the lake or boat could detect his movements. They had to get away and they were.

Truly, fate had been unkind to Roger.

And, as the boat went driving down the lake, the island, the high land and all potently watched it go—watched it go with Korway in command.

To say that each moment increased the distance would be to express the facts feebly. Korway, with a skill that would never to lessen its force, the boat flew through the water and reeled to right after knot until the island was far away.

Never Korway had his time of triumph, and he enjoyed it more than anybody there knew, but he veiled his feelings and acted better than one full of fears. When certain that there was to be no new call for an immediate tack, he brought his helm up to the ready friend and sympathizer. Explaining that they must run before the wind while it lasted, he left charge of sail and boat and approaching task of rescuing Severn.

Gouin and Chardonnais were pretty and naturally that even those most prejudiced against him were staggered in their unbelief.

Could it be he really meant them well?

Upset by the sudden change in their course matters, there were those in the craft who had not had the courage of Baptiste to act, but their attention was finally drawn to the point imperatively.

"It is growing darker," exclaimed David.

"So it seems," agreed Peter with gravity. "We are about to go."

"Well, if we keep on we shall go to ruin. We must land on some island and wait it out."

"Is it not possible to get back to where Severn is?" asked Helen anxiously.

"I think you are wrong as to that, Mr. Dow," said Gouin. "I only think it does blow a bit less powerfully."

"Then let us go to Severn."

"What! Land on that shore? Look at them!"

David looked and fell silent. Anxious as he was to have the partisan with them, he did not want to face that turbulent water.

"We must go on," said Baptiste in dull undertone.

"Voyageurs," pursued Korway, "do any of you know a good island for us to camp about here?"

Gouin studied his master's face with doubt in his expression.

"There is one island ever yonder a little ways," he replied hesitatingly.

"Then I will try to make it. Shall we not, Mr. Dow? It is for you to say."

"The sooner we camp, the better," answered David.

"Then we will go ashore quickly."

Peter gave the helm to Roger and land appeared on the leeward side.

"I wonder if there is a safe harbor?" said Korway, and he looked at Gouin about the matter.

"I think it not the direction in which Gouin pointed," reminded David.

"Any port in a storm," replied Peter.

Korway put the helm to him to study the shore. He knew the island as a child knows the nursery, and knew that Peter, while been steering for it, but he had his pretenses to make, and he continued to keep about the course for which he had.

It would not do for him to know the lake too well.

Presently they were near a crescent-shaped bay, and he ran in and kissed the boat safely up on the beach on an ideal spot. Largely protected from the wind, there was no need to care for the craft, and the thick growth of pines and willows made the refuge agreeable, in spite of the now deepening darkness.

But, as they were landing, Baptiste Proue touched David's arm.

"This place," he whispered, "is out of the

16 Foot Steel Launch With 2 H.P. Engine $96.00

16-ft. steel launches at unquestionable prices. All launches fitted with two cycle reversing engines with speed controlling lever, simplest engine made, clutch and reversing, has only three moving parts. Boat weighs 600 lbs. will take 1500 with water-tight compartments. Engine weighs 100 lbs. Boat and engine the acme of perfection at prices unheard of in the world. Order filled day received. We will direct to your rail-way or steamboat's point. Free catalogue.

Mich. Steel Boat Co., 1261 Jeff Av., Detroit, Mich.

usual course taken by the canoe brigades."

"What," asked David hastily, "do you make of this case?"

"Nothing! Watch!" returned Baptiste softly.

"What about Severn?"

"I don't know."

"Can we get back easily from here?"

"Why not, if we try? I don't know this part of the lake, and we may be almost anywhere, but we can go back as we came —if we start."

"You doubt Korway?"

"I do not keep your weapons ready."

These words had been hurriedly said. No more could be added without attracting attention to their secret conference, and they did not want to do this.

Camp was pitched under the pines. The voyageurs laughed and jested as usual, and Baptiste was not behind his fellows in the appearance of jollity. Yet, as they sat down to eat of pemmican and drink of tea there was a spirit loose that presaged ill for the future.

Korway had seated himself by Francois Lasure.

"I want to speak with you after supper," he whispered anon.

"We do not go away then?" asked Francois.

"Some of us," Peter replied, "my stay here through eternity!"

CHAPTER XV.

THE STRICKEN CAMP.

The wind had abated largely and there was reason to hope that the squall was about over. The Lake of Woods was still vexed by the unwelcome wooer that had torn at its placid face and stirred its depths. Until the waves subsided it would be impossible to go back to rescue Roger Severn from Deer Island.

Peter Korway had said so, and the voyageurs agreed with him. Helen and David, anxious as they were, had to admit the impossibility of facing the driving billows with safety. They did not confess what they thought to Peter, but, standing near the sister's edge, after supper, they watched the successive rollers thunder on the shore and did not consider the advisability of demanding such action from the men.

"I fear," added David, after a time given to discussion, "that we shall have to wait until morning."

"What will happen to the partisan?" asked the girl anxiously.

"Severn will be all right."

Helen sighed and was silent.

"It is not yet a tale of now," pursued David; "ourselves and a certain Inland fierce."

"Unlucky treasure!"

"But it is your bill, child."

"Better that it should be lost than saved at great cost. Money is not all. When the partisan comes—if he does come—I shall ask him to throw the treasure to those who hunger for it like famished dogs, and himself and his honest men to save themselves while they can."

"Useless counsel! Severn is not the kind to turn his back on duty because danger frowns. Are am I?" added the agent ardently. "Well do I remember the past. Asa Birdell toiled hard and long for the money we carry. He braved the dangers of the wild pines and suffered from heat and cold. Will we say that you should have this treasure, and you shall have it or—or my bones lie in the sands!—and"

"David, David, old friend, do not feel so intensely. Your loyalty is certain and noble, and it is grateful to me, but your life is worth more than money."

"My life is not worth a shilling if we fail in this. Fail? We will not fail! The treasure goes through!"

Again Helen sighed, but she made no reply.

"Enough of this," added David. "We may be overheard. Where are the men? I do not see them all."

"Korway and Lasure walked away to explore the island—so Korway said. They are not yet back."

David fell to pulling viciously at his beard. His mind was ill at ease; he was more troubled than he would confess to the girl. Severn was left behind, and they were out of the usual canoe route. Lake of the Woods was a great sheet of water, and, in the outlying bays, little seen by men. There were vast possibilities for evil at this isolating camp.

He dreaded to think what the night might bring forth. That Korway was not really Jason Bardell he did not doubt, nor did he doubt that Jason knew that "Isaac Campbell" was Stolen. In disguise, nor that Jason knew the treasure was in one of the Inland packets.

He was equally assured that Jason would risk his life and soul to steal the twenty thousand pounds.

David felt helpless that night. The odds had been against Severn when Roger was there. Now they were without their strongest ally, physically and in without the quick and sagacious mind that directed the fortunes of the brigade.

Presently David and Helen returned to the fire, where Korway soon joined them. He came with deliberate step and an easy manner.

"Voyageurs," he said at once, "I think you had better turn in early tonight. We must be off to pick Severn up as soon as a boat can be launched, you know; so get to your rest."

"You are right," replied Louis Gouin.

So saying he started for his blanket, and others followed his example—first Carrel and Dorval, then Cadot and Petit. The last two were slow to move, while Proue and Chardonnais did not stir. Baptiste looked at David as if seeking some sign, but none was given. The significance of all this lay in the fact that the hour was early for retiring, and that the voyageurs usually suited their own pleasure in that matter.

Baptiste saw evil designs in this plan to get them to bed, but he did not know what to expect.

It so happened that David, unsuspicious of any hidden motives, approved of this plan, and himself set the example. In a short time every person but one was wrapped in his blanket and lying down. Even then there was something to worry Baptiste. Chardonnais, as soon as he yielded to the plan, was among the first to seek his bed, and this he had no sooner done than Carrel and Dorval took position, the one on one side of him and the other on the opposite hand.

He was thus boxed up, as it were.

Gouin had been slow, and had cast covert glances at Proue. These had been observed by Baptiste, and, warned by what had happened to Chardonnais, he kept afoot until he saw Gouin at rest. He did not intend to have any of Korway's favorites so close to him that he could not move without attracting attention.

Another thing was on Baptiste's mind. Francois Lasure had gone away with Peter and had not been seen since. What did that mean? Was he kept away to favor Peter's coming stroke?

Baptiste was wearied, but from being wakeful and nervous he gradually grew more composed of mind and decided that, after all, things might not be as bad as they seemed, and so he drifted away into slumber.

Another person there did not so easily succumb to drowsiness. Helen lay in her blanket with every sense on the alert. Fear pressed upon in divers ways. Severn, the treasure, David and herself—each had a peculiar peril in the future. What would be the outcome? What could be done to avert the dreaded blow?

Never before had she been so nervous as at that moment.

It was an hour after lying down that she thought she heard a peculiar sound at the water's edge. She at once thought of the treasure. She and David lay apart from the rest, as usual, and she turned a trifle and looked toward the other men.

"You must flee."

She thought she could see eight of them near the fire. But what of the ninth? She too, noticed that Francois Lasure did not return with Korway. Where was he now? What was he doing?

The wind had lulled so much that she thought the water must have become fairly quiet. It might be possible to move a boat, and if Lasure was secretly engaged in purloining it? This might cause the sound by the shore.

Her late indifference as to the treasure vanished. It suddenly loomed high in importance. She had been the object of her dead guardian's earnest wishes, and the safety of Roger Severn's watch and care. The dying hopes of the one and the reputation of the other were at stake. The treasure—it must not, it must not be lost!

Quietly she rose and moved, soft-footed, toward the water. Not silent, she would not awaken him. He was not a young man to be needful of rest. He needed strength for the future.

It was not far to go. She soon stood by the water. And the boat was there. Whatever the cause of the sound she had heard, the boat was there. First, go and try to rouse Ezra Dow!

Mechanically Helen moved. His assertion that David was drugged dazed and almost overwhelmed her. Could she trust Lasure?—the man who was despised by all in the boat, and contemptuously called "the Blood"—dared she trust him for a moment?

She went softly and reached David's side. He lay without motion. She bent over him and shook him gently by the arm.

"David!" she whispered softly.

There was no reply and no motion. She increased the force of her grasp and of her whisper.

"David, David!"

He remained as motionless as the waving pines above them.

By that time keen apprehension was tugging at her heart-strings, and she grew vehement. She shook the agent violently, but he was like a clod. Greatly agitated, she stood erect and meditated rapidly. The agent for whom her movements would not naturally be seen by those nearer the fire. Half-way between, Baptiste Proue reclined in his blanket. Had as it was, she resolved to try the voyageur.

Kneeling softly to his side she shook him as she had shaken David, but Baptiste, a man accustomed by wild life to awaken at the least alarm, was slumbering sound and knew nothing of her efforts.

She crept back into the deeper shadows, dazed, trembling and full of terror. It was as Lasure Colot had said; the deep sleep which held her protectors in its grasp was not sleep, but drugged unconsciousness.

Blind chance to a tree for support and faced the situation with every nerve quivering. What was she to do? Remain, and be at the mercy of known foes, or trust herself with the unknown companion elsewhere? On the one side was a full camp and on the other Lasure Colot, the despised, the unnatural, the little understood. With the first party, the Island and hope of rescue; with the latter, the solitary wilderness.

Which was she to choose?

CHAPTER XVI

TRACES OF VIOLENCE.

It was the following morning. Lake of the Woods was rough, but not dangerously so. A canoe that was proceeding up the lake suffered no harm from the waters. Its occupants she heard, as in a dream and a child. All were Indians, and of a class that indicated the mixture of white and men who roamed the eastern fur-land.

Presently the attention of the man became drawn to her as a new something out of the ordinary course of life on the lake. An island lay almost directly ahead, and on an elevated point he beheld a man who was waving frantic arms. He and his men even thought he could hear shouts.

The Indian changed his course slightly and bent on the island. He spoke for a time urged on by motions and shouts, and then the person on the elevation headed down to the water's edge and stood ready to meet him.

The island was Spur Island, and the man was Roger Severn.

He had not remained a passive castaway. Once, despite the rough waves and distance, he had essayed to swim away, but was caught in an unsuspected undertow and nearly lost his life. After that he did not repeat the experiment when the canoe appeared.

Now, he addressed the Indian before they had fairly met.

"Have you or an inland boat down the lake?" he asked.

"Where?" inquired the canoeman.

"Anywhere."

"Not today."

"Where are you from?"

"Lake Winnipeg."

"Have you seen the Montreal Express?"

"Yes. I met it at Rat Portage."

"Have you seen any other brigade?"

"No, but I have talked with traded, which was alone. I knew the partisan. It was Alexis Michel."

"Where was he?"

"A short way below Lee Dallas."

"Below Lee Dallas!—below?"

"Yes."

"And ahead of the Express?"

"Yes."

Roger was amazed and filled with consternation that he fell silent, but the Indian took up the conversation again.

"Alexis Michel stopped me and asked if we had seen another boat lower down, but we had not. Then we saw, we were from Lake Winnipeg, but not all the way by water. We started to visit the lodges of relatives to the east, so we left the river between Trois Pointes des Bois and Chute a Jacquot, and went inland, and then after two or three days, we came on, we struck the river again at Sandy Lake. So we could tell Alexis whether there was a boat ahead of him or not."

Roger said nothing. He was in the whirlpool of consternation. No doubt the same power that had drugged David had drugged Alexis astray, and, while he turned back and made the wide inland journey, Jason Bardell, his other boat was speeding down the Winnipeg River, evidently under the impression that Alexis was ahead with the treasure.

Truly, treachery was rampant and in full force. Roger now felt himself forced to make his fight against Peter Korway single-handed, for Alexis and the second crew of voyageurs.

"When I saw them last," added the Indian, breaking the silence, "they were traveling fast onward."

"Then," returned Roger, arousing, "that you have seen no boat today. Did you see one last evening?"

"No, but there was one near us. The squall took us unawares and drove us out of our course. We landed on Grassy Island and spent the night there. In the midst of the storm I thought I distinctly seen on Beaver-tail Point, and there were nearly a dozen men by it. We knew they had a boat because the noise of a sail was heard before the fire shut up, and, afterwards, they often went to the water and carried packets and the like. All this we saw from Campbell's Island, but made no fire, it is not likely they saw us."

"What more? Where are they now?"

"I don't know. We left before daylight, and I can't say whether the men were still there."

"I will give you three pounds to take me to Beaver-tail Point."

The Indian hesitated, turned his head and spoke with the two women in his canoe. Roger waited anxiously. The Indian was a rather fine looking man, and his disposition to let his female passengers have a voice in proceedings showed that he was not a fire-eater. The decision was soon made and briefly announced.

(Continued on page fourteen.)

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

35 YEARS OLD.

Published Every Saturday

BY

W. D. BOYCE CO.

All communications should be addressed to

THE CHICAGO LEDGER,
112, 114 DEARBORN ST.,
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES.

Single subscriptions to the Chicago Ledger by mail $1.00 a year, 50 cents for six months, in advance. If not paid in advance, $1.50 a year, $1.00 for six months. Installments will be taken. Subscriptions may be sent to the nearest office or Express Money Order, payable to The Chicago Ledger. Subscription rates in Canada, $1.50 a year.

ADVERTISING.

Advertising rate $1.40 per Agate Line per insertion, for advertisements in The Chicago Ledger and Saturday Blade.

Entered at the postoffice at Chicago, Illinois, as second-class matter.

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

THE SATURDAY BLADE

Average More Than

750,000

COPIES WEEKLY

PROVED CIRCULATION.

BACK NUMBERS.

Back numbers of the Ledger can be had by addressing Subscriber. Always give the number desired, plainly written, accompanied by your full address, and your order will receive prompt attention. Price, 5 cents per copy.

BEWARE OF STRANGERS.

The Ledger employs no traveling agents to solicit subscriptions, and never authorizes any one to collect money in front. No person is authorized to take subscriptions for the Ledger unless he has a card from the office of publication which he will exhibit when called upon to act this paper every week. A liberal reward will be paid to any person that will enable us to convict and punish each person or persons now traveling from town to town in different sections of this country, claiming to be connected with the Ledger and thereby defrauding the people. Beware of strangers.

Beware of mad dogs and backbiting people.

Bread is the staff of life; sugar is the cane.

Build your hopes high—then stand from under.

The early fish hook will soon be going down the pike.

There is more than a peck of trouble in some pint bottles.

After telling a little white lie twice it begins to turn black.

When one man tries to flatter another he has something to sell.

No. Cordelia, footnotes are not produced by having a baby.

A dead lion is better than a live dog—for rug-making purposes.

And the fool with money to burn may drive an auto cart in after years.

Our worries would be few if it wasn't for the things that never happen.

A man's fool friends cause him almost as much trouble as his wise enemies.

No matter how hungry a man may be a single taste of defeat satisfies him.

People who think they are too good to live ought to patronize the undertaker.

Some men are so nice to their wives that it arouses the suspicion of the neighbors.

Some people are purse-proud because they haven't anything else to be proud of.

The more patience a woman has with her children the less she has with their father.

It doesn't necessarily follow that a man is any good just because he's as good as his word.

In the case of a photographer success depends on his ability to take things as they come.

The peach crop will probably be a failure this year. This does not apply to the summer girl.

While you may not be able to lead a man to water, you seldom have to ask him twice to face the barrel question.

On her wedding day a young widow always wonders how many men will commit suicide on her account.

The wise man looks before he leaps—then instead of jumping into the fire he remains in the frying pan.

Woman lawyers are scarce; yet almost every married man knows at least one woman who is capable of laying down the law to him.

One woman who applies for a divorce says that her husband took her home on their wedding day and that his former wife was at the door and wouldn't let her in, but took back her husband. Some men are so careless about doing things of that sort.

Two Faces Under One Hat.

(Continued from page three.)

my own innocence, I shall stand my trial."

"And hang!"

"I will not believe it!" cried Mark. "Go! Your presence will drive me wild!"

"Well, think it over during the long, dark hours of the night, and if your life is worth more to you than five hundred dollars, I stand ready to leave an outlet for your escape. But, mind, only as long as that money is in my possession. I am off now; but shall return once more to-night with bread and meat. After that you will have the night in solitude to ponder over the matter. I know how you will decide in the end. Life is dear to even a murderer!"

"Wretch! You have heard my decision."

"Ha, ha!" echoed the jailer's laugh, as he locked the door behind him.

"Brute! fiend!" groaned Mark. "And I—oh, God! I stand condemned by my own mouth!"

"That's as true he you live," retorted Dobbins, as he hastily strode from the door.

CHAPTER XI.

CALEB MARSH SOLILOQUIZES.

Caleb Marsh, after he had left the courthouse, drove direct to the shed where he was accustomed to leave his team. His hands were none too steady while he was tying him.

"What changes a few short hours can make in a man's prospects!" he muttered. "Kate Ellis is free and happy as a bird again, and landed safely in Lundy County Jail is the proper young man who has been foisted on her from me. Ha, ha, Mark Perry! I'm your friend, your friend, never doubt it! It will pain me to testify to the facts that will send you dangling at a rope's end, but I'll do it, nevertheless, for Kate Ellis shall think so. There is no other way—hang you must!

"Why, what other fate should a murderer meet? A murderer? Ha, ha! The hand is not mine that strikes the blow that will hang you—he has not a single doubt of your guilt—not one! And evidence? Why, I will be the same as Cleaver's. What else should it be? S'pose I did catch a glimpse of you as you disappeared over the top of the hill a moment before you cried out 'Help, help!' Pshaw! In no way can that matter. You are done for, Mark Perry, done for!

"Ah, but if you knew—if Doctor Dunn knew of this rusty button, which I picked from the clenched hand of the murdered man into my open palm, the jail doors would be open to-day in broad daylight. Here Caleb withdrew the button from his pocket and looked at it, a sardonic smile came off an overcoat! That's no indication the coat came from was blue, 'a that it once worn by Cleaver. It may have been, but—" and he glanced uneasily around as he thrust the button back into his vest pocket.

"I must go over to Rogers' and then ride out to the inquest. After that I must stop at Elwood. I imagine there will be a slight remuneration there for what I expect to undertake. I must change my tactics for a time. If Mark Perry is to hang, which he must be all sympathy—I must extend the mortgages for another year. Then, this job—his ride, and I'll lay my wives to gain the girl's consent—not now, but after a time.

"I will be good to Abner and Kate. I will do all I can to save them, but that—then Caleb Marsh will show his teeth again. That girl will become my wife before she will see the inside of another Elwood. She will grieve awhile for Mark, I s'pose. I don't blame her, and she should grieve over the loss of a sweetheart, when that sweetheart is a candidate for the gallows.

"In three months time, at most, the execution will take place. Then I will have those officers find the man who—some suspicious circumstance—has got away with the money? Gods! I am running ahead too fast. Then Horton, when he arrives, will not believe Mark guilty. He will spend money to clear him, employ Chicago lawyers—yes, Horton will go to work and try to ferret out the man who wore the coat that Sally, even as the dirk was thrust in his breast, cried out 'twas there by which none but I discovered.

"Gods! Another tragedy may see Mark Perry come out of this and with flying colors! Ah, but the money that was to pay off my mortgages! Where is that? What! It may be recovered; if not, Horton is wealthy, and the loss of a few hundred and ten thousand dollars may not deter him from acting as Mark would have me.

"I wish Cleaver had shot and killed the boy when he started off that time. I might have brought him back. I would not think of everything at once. Mark is not out of my way yet. Doctor Dunn will believe him guilty and when Horton sees him—but must he see him?"

Here Caleb Marsh gave his head right hand down on his leg's back with a force that startled the animal.

"If it could be worked, it would be the very plan! And if worked at all, it must be tonight. It can be, must be! As Caleb Marsh, you are a schemer—now set your self to work! You must make the suggestion that the officers will not apprehend the man from whose coat the button came—not will they. Little will they bother their heads. Cleaver will convince them that the murderer is in jail.

"If you work the plant that is now running through your brain, Mr. Marsh, every man, woman and child in Lundy A. County will be ready to swear that Mark Perry is a murderer tomorrow morning—yes, even the dead man's partner will be convinced. A great head you have, Caleb Marsh! No danger of his ever returning, for every newspaper in the land will be full of his crime.

"Rewards will be offered for his capture. But will he go? Humph! Trust me to work him up to that point. If he's captured thereafter, what then? He is smart and he will not be. Even if he is, what care I? My word has always been as good as my bond. Who would believe him? No one! Where would be the object? None would be whether he lived or died. Why then should I stand here longer like a fool? First, for the means!

"Ah, I will be looked for at the inquest! Never mind, I was not summoned. Of course, it was supposed I would be there. Cleaver's evidence will hold Mark so court. Yes, and it will aid me elsewhere not to be subpoenaed. The sympathy for Kate Ellis kept me away! Now for a piece of work, and without leaving a trail behind me."

Caleb on leaving the shed where he had been so intently engrossed with his thoughts that he had not even noticed when the train passed through the town, entered the corner bar and called for a glass of brandy.

Now, Caleb Marsh was not a tippler, and it is safe to say that he had never been under the influence of liquor in his life. He held that for two reasons a man was a fool to follow the practice of tippling—one was that the habit was expensive, the other—well, let us for that quote a phrase he often used: "When whisky is in, wit is out. Consequently, Caleb seldom indulged, but on this occasion he felt he needed such a stimulant.

The barkeeper looked up as he gave his order, then arose from his chair with alacrity and placed a glass and a decanter on the bar.

"Ah, Mr. Marsh," he said, "I supposed you had come to attend the inquest. I guess you was one of the principal witnesses. Horrible affair, wasn't it?" he said.

"Bad indeed," said Caleb, as he turned to his brandy, "but I have not quite finished my business here. I will be there when called to summon me, and I have no heart for the business. The testimony of Mr. Cleaver will be sufficient to hold the prisoner in court. I s'pose I will have to testify then, but it pains me mightily on account of the Ellis family. Good evening. Have the parcels ready tomorrow."

"Well, I'm damned!" exclaimed the barkeeper, as Caleb mounted his carriage and rode hold back for fear of giving pain to others before."

Five minutes later Caleb entered the door of a hardware store, barely a block from the bar.

To his satisfaction he found no one in the store aside from Frank Rogers, the proprietor, who was one of those latter years and very hard of hearing.

"Rogers!" he said loudly, as he approached to where he stood leaning over the counter. "I want one of those patent padlocks, large size, to put on my barn."

"Padlock, Mr. Marsh? Yes, yes, I'm glad you want something! Mr. Cleaver bought a padlock an assortment before him.

Caleb fumbled them over and finally selected one.

"I want two pair of plow hames, same as I got last spring."

"Plow hames? Well, I will have to go upstairs for them. You can watch the store, Mr. Marsh, until I return?"

"Yes, sir, I will watch."

Rogers proceeded to the back of the store and ascended the stairs.

The moment he was out of sight than Caleb Marsh passed around the end of the counter, where he drew from before a row of pigeonholes, some twelve inches square, and which had been constructed to hold light articles of hardware.

"Here we are, first thing," he thought. "There are ten dozen files here. Which of these will do? Good steel there. They will do the work. Ah, yes, they are marked thirty-five cents each. I don't care to steal them."

Saying he slipped two files within the breast pocket of his coat, and when Rogers came down the stairs Caleb was found in where he had left him. "Here you are, Mr. Marsh, I guess these will suit you, they are about the best we have."

"Yes, they are all right. Wrap them up and I will put them in the buggy. The padlock I'll put in my pocket. What's the bill?"

"What's that? Oh, the bill! Three dollars and seventy-five cents, please."

Caleb paid four dollars and a half the counter.

"That overpays me seventy-five cents, Mr. Marsh."

"I owed you seventy-five cents from last spring," said Caleb, "and have paid it before, but never thought of it. Now we are square."

"I don't remember it," said Rogers, knitting his brow, as though trying to. "I have no recollection of it."

"All the same, I owed it. I never forget a debt or a debtor; obliged to you, Rogers. Good day."

"Good day, Mr. Marsh."

Caleb mounted with his purchases, and Rogers for a moment stood running the fingers of one hand through his thin hair. "Strange I should remember a debtor," he muttered, "and it's clear that there is more than one of 'em, and I've had forgotten that you owed me a dime."

It was half an hour after six when Caleb passed through the open gate of the county house and approached the jail.

He found Dobbins, the jailer, who resided but a short distance away, was just leaving that institution.

"Hello, Dobbins, I want to see you!" was Caleb's greeting.

"Why, Mr. Marsh! I thought you had gone out to the inquest."

"No, I did not get off, Dobbins: there will be enough evidence without mine to hold the prisoner to court."

"Evidence enough? Why, my evidence alone would hang him higher than a kite. I had not left the jail after locking him up before I heard him wailing out: 'I am a murderer!' Then, know what that means? Remorse, despair! Oh, it's competent evidence. He is sure to hang."

"You heard these words, did you?" said Caleb excitedly, "did you tell him?"

"Why, yes, I probably will be ordered to shackle him tomorrow. I am sorry for the sheriff. He will have to hang him!"

"Bad business, bad business, and it affects me mightily, Dobbins, mightily on account of the Ellis family. You know, he was engaged to marry the daughter."

"Thunder! A lucky escape she has had."

"Yes, but it is a sad affair. I am about to start for home. I shall stop at Elwood and let Ellis and his daughter know all about the unfortunate affair and I thought I'd best as an old friend to bear any message from Mark to the girl he professed to love. I think he will be down and confess the whole business before I leave him, now that you tell me you heard him use those words."

"You can go right in, Mr. Marsh, right in! Guess he'll be glad to see a friend's bondsmen."

This was so, but not only did Marsh have a bond guaranteeing him against loss, but the sheriff paid his taxes, amounting to several hundred dollars each year.

"I shall wish to remain a half-hour or so, Dobbins. I have much to say to Mark Perry. You must lock me in, and I will knock on the door when I wish to come out. I suppose a jailer's pay don't much in a county like this, and you look hungry. Here, take this, and with a half-dollar and get a good stiff drink of brandy. I'll bet a dime you can get some to blossom's shed and drive my horse back with you. It's getting late and when I leave here I have to ride."

"Certainly, certainly," said Dobbins, as he accepted the bill and the dime and turned up lamp on that window ledge there. Look out for him now. I have brought you a visitor."

Dobbins closed and locked the door, then made his way to the entrance for Dan Horton, wondering what had come over Caleb Marsh.

This has caused him to forget the value of money," he thought. "Well, I will accommodate him. I will drive the handy and drive back. Fifty cents from Caleb Marsh—Jerusalem!"

CHAPTER XII.

"GIVE ME THE FILES, CALEB MARSH!"

Mark was lying at full length and face downward on the bench when Caleb was admitted. The prisoner had eaten bread and meat, which certainly had no attraction for him, as was sitting at the mass.

"Mark Perry," commenced Caleb, as soon as the jailer's footfall had died away, "I don't wonder you are weak and nervous. Right now in the shadow of the gallows. Mark, Mark, how could you, a well educated man—hard for his partner—hard for my old friend Ellis, and terrible, terrible for the young girl who loves you, to do it. You will high-about kill her, if it don't quite."

"Caleb Marsh," cried Mark, springing to his feet, his features working with emotion and his face pallid, "you have professed to feel friendly towards me!"

"Professed! I am proud of you, Mark. I was your friend, and more, I am yet. I have proved it. Do you suppose I would be now the inquest is going on at Sandy Run? If I was not your friend, I would be there testifying to facts that would send you home. I have shirked a duty, Mark—I couldn't do it. You may answer me, but save you from the hangman's knot, and worse than that, the jailer, who heard you cry out, denounced you to the sheriff, and you'd be condemn you.

"All the lawyers in the State couldn't save you. Horton may be your friend, but he can't do, you? Now. Tomorrow you will be in a cell.

"Oh, God! and an innocent man!"

"You may be, Mark. I don't say you are not, but innocent or guilty, you will hang! Look at the matter as it is, no power on earth can save you."

"Oh, why do you come here to plunge me deeper in despair?"

"Listen! Because I am your friend, because I would save you from the gallows, and the girl you claim you love the shock, the disgrace, of having you, the betrothed husband of her sister, die the death of a felon on the gallows.

"Save me from the gallows? You, you? Then you know I am not guilty?"

"No, Mark, no testimony of mine would aid you. But if the life of your life is saved from the gallows, it must be tonight. Now, listen! I am your friend, and never to save it. Those three slender bars in that window there are alone between you and freedom, and I have brought forth the files from his pocket. "is that which will secure them. When once the files are sawed you must be many miles from here, and if you are not apprehended, I think you are, you will not be apprehended."

"Never, Caleb Marsh, never! Why, my

WE WANT NAMES OF BOYS

We want YOU to send us the names and addresses of ten or more bright boys from 12 to 17 years of age living in the United States. You can send us the names from any number of different families or offices. If you send us these names we will send you TWO BEAUTIFUL COLORED PICTURES FREE. These pictures are reproductions of the most celebrated paintings in the world, and are of high quality, and we know that you will be pleased and delighted with them; no pictures will be given for a list of less than five boys.

We want to introduce into every home a free sample copy of our PARAGON, and our offer of a free Moving Picture Machine, the greatest fun and money maker ever offered to boys in the country. It is for this reason we want the names.

Send us immediately a list of at least ten boys and we will send you, postpaid, Absolutely Free, Two Reproductions of the World's Famous Pictures in beautiful colors, size 19 x 26 inches. Address THE PARAGON, 323 W. 63d Street, New York, N. Y.

flight would be construed as an admission of guilt. Impossible!

"To remain here is to die on the gallows! Take your choice. At least, I have proved to you and more nearly than will any other living man, that I am your friend; and as to your flight being an admission of your guilt, you forget that Dobbin will testify that you have anxiously admitted it.

"Why did those words fall from my lips? They were these, Mr. Marsh: 'To all appearances I am a murderer.' Dobbin, the unprincipled wretch, claims only to have heard the latter part of the sentence. He has offered to liberate me forthwith for five hundred dollars and vows I will hang within three months unless I accede to his proposition.

"Dobbin? Oh, ho, I see! He would get your money, and then laugh at you. Of course, he knows you will be condemned to death, else do you suppose he would have made you the proposition? Don't you see, he has no fear of you? He argues that no one will believe you. Why, he will testify that you offered him your last dollar to leave you a chance of escape, and that he scorned your offer, that your charges against him are made from spite. Now, boy, you say you are innocent—best live, and why not? Better established, rather than have it come to light after you have filled a felon's grave. Living, all things are possible to you—dead, none.

"But this very night the murderer may be apprehended.

"Bear in mind, Mark, that the coroner's jury will find you guilty of murder. Think you that further search will be made, when the whole community will believe the murderer to be in jail? I will be there with his your last chance. Do you believe in my friendship now?"

"I have doubted it, Mr. Marsh—forgive me, I can do so no longer; but I can never consent to the course you propose."

Caleb Marsh bit his lips and his features worked convulsively. "Then you think I would propose it," he asked, "unless I foresaw the result? Do you think Kate or Ellis will say when I tell her and her father, as I shall in confidence, for I know they will not betray it, that you refused the only channel to liberty and to eventuality establish your innocence?

"There is no telling what a year may bring forth, unexpected events are constantly coming to light—the man who committed that murder—and now I am going on the assumption that you are not you—"

"As God is my judge, it was not!"

"Well, the ten thousand dollars in cash, at least. No one is under suspicion, aside from yourself. He will not be apprehended for the crime. Murderers and thieves do not keep money long and that gone, he will commit another crime, perhaps be apprehended and condemned to death. Before he is executed will he confess his former crimes, this one among them.

"When that time comes, will you be sleeping in a dishonored grave? Well, you can leave with the memories of a broken-hearted girl who loves you and who had faith in your innocence, of a gray-haired old man, who steadily looks on you as a son. I think I have performed my duty by you."

"Oh, God, if I knew! If I knew!"

"You know it! Not the gallows before you! As for my mortgages, I will extend them. I will let the interest and principal run until you could not redeem a brother father and his daughter. Some men, had they sought the daughter of their enemy, not be here pleading with a successful suitor, and a man who he would soon remove from their path, to live. I am. I realize that I am getting to be an old man—much too old to be a rival for love to a young girl. Live, Mark Perry! Live, and you may yet wed the one you love and your name vindicated.

"This is your last chance! I have been here already too long. Act! Act the part of a man of brains, and act quickly."

"Oh, Mr. Marsh—For your sake, yours! But will you tell Mr. Horton when he arrives of my absence of my flight? He will keep your confidence."

"Yes, if he believes in your innocence. I will explain it to him and he will doubtless does. Oh, he will approve of our courses and a general effort to discover who murdered his partner."

"I believe me! He will never for one moment betray my integrity."

"Then you have my promise! More, accept a man's word of honor—on a man's point where a letter will reach you two weeks hence and I will advise you of how matters progress. Why, boy, you are young; with a whole lifetime before you, the girl you love your wife, and happiness —If you take my advice, a halter, if you do not."

"Give me the files, Caleb Marsh! Give me the files! I thank God at this moment for one friend as you. Let men talk of you henceforth as cold and hard, one day, they shall know within your rough exterior there beats a heart as true as steel, and more you, for all your power."

With one shaking hand Caleb extended the files, while with the other he raised his handkerchief to his eyes. To hide his tears? No! Lest Mark note the look of triumph that overflown.

"Let's see! Let's see!" said Mark excitedly! "Let the name be Alfred Jones, Merrida, Colorado. Address, the general delivery, and if I am not captured I will write you a letter."

"You must not be captured—will not be! Remember, you are fleeing for your life and to secure the happiness of those you love. Commence operations as soon as you safely can—forever check, at the latest. You can soon cut through those bars, and you will have the whole night before you. You have determined wisely, and now, good-by. I must knock on the door to attract the jailer."

"Wait, Mr. Marsh! I have that six hundred dollars here; will you give it to Kate and tell her, and tell he—tell her what you will, but tell her I love her?"

"No, no, Mark, you will need all that to aid you in your flight. I promise they shall not come to wait; but remember, you must not write to a living soul, either here or elsewhere—mails will be watched. A single word would betray you!"

"Not one! I am risking much for you. You forget that I am committing a crime. Now, one thing more. Will you buy the newspapers when the guilty man has been apprehended?"

"I shall be as you say; but I am young and strong, I shall not quit this country. I will bury myself in the mines of Colorado. Half this sum will be ample for me, and I will return here for—here! Hastily the young man withdrew the roll of bills from his pocket, and the files were extended his hand. "This to Kate, Mr. Marsh. There is four hundred dollars. Tell her to wait, and to have faith in my integrity."

"You are crazy, Mark! No, no, that will never do! Why, two hundred dollars is a small sum for a man fleeing for his life. I tell you, your sweetheart and her father shall not come to want. I will not allow you to deprive me of the pleasure."

"True, he would not. And, Mr. Marsh, if you will grant the request, I will gladly let him that my last request was that he take from my pocket, and the money this fatful crime had not been committed. He will do it for my sake. Tell him, Mr. Marsh, to be kind to Kate, I love."

"Put, boy, I don't want the money, they shall be my charges."

"Nevertheless, take the money! Can you not consider it a loan? Tell her I love her—me to the girl I love! I cannot go, otherwise."

"Well, if you must have it so, divide it, say two hundred and fifty, and I will take it to her."

"No, three; that is half I had, or nearly so. There, no less, no less!"

"Then I will take it with me, as he thrust the bills in his pocket, "to be parting with good money on a bad risk. Now, Mark, grip my hand, Mark," he continued. "Good-by and God speed you, that depends on the success of your flight."

"Good-by, my friend," sobbed Mark, as he grasped the hand extended. "I shall never forget you! You have stood between me and starvation and the gallows and may God bless you!"

The poor boy's head almost sank on Caleb's shoulder.

"Come, come! Brace up, brace up!" said Marsh unsteadily. "Be a man, Mark! Good-by!" he exclaimed in a louder voice, as he turned to the door.

"First, Mr. Marsh, will you lend a note to my poor Kate?"

"You have time to write it quick. Be careful how you word it—nothing of your contemplated flight."

On a leaf torn from a memorandum book, Mark with a pencil wrote these words:

"My Darling: Mr. Marsh will inform you of the terrible charge that has been committed and of the unfortunate position I am in. I need not tell you I am not guilty. Have implicit confidence in me. Declare me so. Have faith in my love, and trust in the near future for my release. Mr. Marsh is my true friend. He will extend the mortgages. If you request it, and my friend, Mr. Horton will take them up. You will see him tomorrow. My own, my darling, I can write no more. Do not let your father doubt my integrity. Yours until death,

"MARK."

The young man folded this note and handed it to Caleb, who thrust it in his pocket.

"Now, a word to Mr. Horton," he said.

"A word? I wouldn't waste a word," said Marsh, "you can't! Of course, it is supposed that you will expect to see him in your absence. If so, I will be there ready to aid to him, and you wouldn't naturally write him a note, would you? Therefore as if we had arranged for your escape and Horton, in his excitement, might say something that would betray me. Therefore I could warn him. Again, some one might read it, and suspicion fall upon Horton. Leave it so! I don't care to be implicated."

"True! Let it be as you say, Mr. Marsh. I leave everything to you."

"Well you have, and now good-by."

As the last words were spoken, Caleb knocked loudly on the door.

"Those files with you," he said; "throw them in a stream somewhere. I will report that you escaped by the window, that of that; but suspicion is not evidence. Don't communicate with me in the future, he comes. It's best to disarm him. Why, where is he?"

Marsh was knocked loudly.

"Coming, Mr. Marsh, coming! I just got back with the files; mislaid I heard of an amusing incident in this line the other day."

Marsh, after exchanging Lincoln, Washington and other reasonable spirits, said in a thrilling voice:

"You knew him?" The medium asked gently.

"Knew him!" moaned the elderly man. "I communed with him daily. O, John, he burst forth again, 'why, why did you have to leave me?'

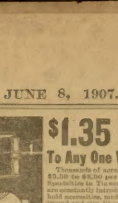
"Courage,' said the medium. 'Calm yourself.' Though his face was a great one, you may yet find another friend to fill his place.

"No, no! Impossible! His place is filled."

"Filled? What do you mean?' asked the puzzled medium.

"The elderly man, shaking his head sadly, answered:

"He was my wife's first husband."



$1.35 OUTFIT FREE

To Any One Who Will Act as Our Agent

Thousands of agents throughout the United States are making $3.50 to $8.00 per day selling our extensive line of Household Specialties in Tinware and Aluminum, which we manufacture and are constantly introducing. Our goods are all first-class, sell on sight, hold succession, make of best material, have ready sale the year round and after the first sale to a family, a customer for repeating orders, so we are able to make this liberal offer:

Here's the OUTFIT OF 7 ARTICLES you get ABSOLUTELY FREE.

No. 1, Shaker Sifter, No. 2, Combination, No. 3, Wonder Egg Beater, No. 4, Nickel Plated Nutmeg, with 1 box Ginger, No. 5, Nickel Plated Grater, No. 6, Can Opener, No. 7, Potato Peeler. Remember, we will put the outfit in a neat box, and you get the whole outfit free.

Cake Tin, 10c. Other articles sell among same lines at 5c. Our catalogue contains hundreds of other articles, and you can be a successful agent from the start. Write us at once for our liberal offer. Our No. 2 Can Opener is a wonder. Every housekeeper buys one on sight. No. 4 Nutmeg and Ginger Grater, No. 5 Nickel Plated Grater, No. 6 Can Opener, No. 7 Potato Peeler. Remember, we will put the outfit in a neat box, and you get the whole outfit free.

If the goods when received are not entirely satisfactory and as represented, return them to us, and your money will be refunded. When writing, mention Number 2 in the Box.

HOUSEHOLD NOVELTY WORKS,
23 Randolph St., Chicago, or Buffalo, N. Y.

All doubts set at rest! Guilty! Guilty! Guilty! And of murder in the first degree! His, his!" and the bay, astonished at his master's mirth, increased his pace of the dusty road.

This dramatic story will be continued in next week's Ledger, promising the readers with some very startling episodes and situations. Its perusal to the end will highly reward you. If you are not a subscriber to the Ledger, you are strongly advised to send in the price of subscription at once. If you do so, we will be glad to send you free one of our King Cameras or any of the patterns you may select from our pattern page. Look at our advertisement on pages thirteen and fifteen.

1 CENT IS ALL IT COSTS
Free Bicycle coupon in each package. DO NOT BUY a bicycle or a sewing machine from a mail order house or dealer. We ship on approval without a cent deposit, freight prepaid, and allow 1 CENT for a postal. All our new and wonderful propositions with this coupon. Write a postal now.
WE WILL CONVINCE you that we can save you from $10 to $25 on a bicycle and that we pay the freight. If you want to Make Money write us at once. Bicycles, Tires, Coaster-Brakes, Sundries, Sundries and all models at half usual prices. DO NOT WAIT, write a postal now.
MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. T 23 Chicago, Ill.

$5.00 DRESSES ANY MAN
FREE TRIAL OFFER
We will prove my statement to you at a 60-day free trial expense. Write me a postal and I will tell you how I can dress you in a suit from my famous $5.00 Suit Sample Outfit, and will also tell you how you can get your suit free. I have made up my mind to sell direct to the wearer and will do so at the wholesale tailor's price, and to guarantee satisfaction or your money back. Write me today and I will tell you how you can get your suit free. Don't send any money, just your name and address on a postal and I will tell you how you can get your suit free. Don't send any money, just your name and address on a postal and I will tell you how you can get your suit free.
HON. ALTON P. HILLS, President
CANADA MILLS CO., Dept. 38, GREENVILLE, MICH

Storm King Whiskey.
The Best That Skill and Time Can Make
Rye or Bourbon
4 Full Quart Bottles, $3.10
6 Full Quarts, 4.50
12 Quarts, 8.75
WE PAY THE Express charges to all points east of the MISSISSIPPI RIVER. SILVERWARE FREE. Return this ad with your next order and we will send you a Wm. Rogers beautifully silver-plated Sugar Shell or Ladle (your choice), worth 50c. Free. (B)
J. C. CHILDS,
183 3d Ave., New York

Big Sporting Goods Bargains
SINGLE BARREL SHOT GUN $2.95
HAMILTON RIFLE $1.50
WRITE US a postal or a letter today stating that you want the Sear Model, 4 and a half inches long, with 3 inch barrel, and we will send you our big catalog containing goods catalog, which 31 pages of Sporting Goods and the most marvelous bargains in the world. Also Bicycles, Guns, Rifles, Revolvers, Air Rifles, Gas Rifles, Repeating Rifles, Shot Guns, Single Barrel Shot Guns, Double Barrel shot guns as low as $1.95, $2.95 up to $14.50 up to $24.50 up to $34.50 up to $44.50 up to $54.50 up to $64.50 up to $74.50 up to $84.50 up to $94.50 up to $104.50 up to $114.50 up to $124.50 up to $134.50 up to

A $700,000,000 VEIN REDISCOVERED AT WONDER, NEV.

Mining Engineers See in the Ore a Positive Similarity to the Great Comstock Lode.

Nevada Greenback Wonder Stock Has Advanced 100 Per Cent in the Last Two Months.

Even old experienced miners who are familiar with all the ins and outs of gold and silver mining are dumfounded at the tremendous progress made upon the Nevada Greenback Wonder mine at Wonder, Nev. The officers of this company who predicted that they had found a bonanza and who made the assertion that they would be sacking and shipping ore before midsummer are now able to state that development of this wonderful property has proceeded to such an extent that they confidently believe they will be in the richest ore much sooner than they had thought possible. This means that dividends may be expected from 2 to 5 months earlier than would otherwise have been the case. Early predictions of the development of this property were based upon the record of other mines in this same camp, but it would now seem that the best of these has been far outstripped with the record of the Nevada Greenback.

Early assays on this property gave $380.32 to the ton. Since then all necessary surface work—trenching, tunneling, etc.—has been completed and the main shaft is now down 40 feet. They are in the formations which are constantly becoming wider and better.

There can be no possible doubt but that this marvelous camp of Wonder is a rediscovery of the old Comstock Lode 30 miles away, which produced practically $700,000,000 before it got too deep for working. The two ores placed side by side cannot be told apart and it is the expressed opinion of experienced miners that it is the same lode but made a thousand times richer and more wonderful by the crossing of another great mineral system extending from Tonopah to Winnemucca. Wonder is at the intersection and the whole region seems to rest upon a foundation of gold and silver. For six miles square the ground is so rich that ore fairly crops from the surface of the earth. Within this region and in the very heart of it is located the property—four full claims—of the Nevada Greenback Wonder.

The Vulture, the Jack Pot, the Alice, the Wasp and Spider, the Stray Horse, the Castle Rock, the Big Wonder, the Junc Wonder, the Rhode Wonderette—I haven't time or space to tell you of them—all are among the properties that are shipping ore worth $250. to $600. a ton.

PROFITS.

The capital stock of the Nevada Wonder is $1,000,000. It is expected that they will easily be able to break down a minimum amount of 100 tons of ore per day; but suppose we figure on only a tenth of this—just ten tons per day. Just figuring upon the surface valuation of this property, $380.00 per ton, this means a gross income of $3,800 daily. From this, of course, must be deducted the cost of mining and sacking and the charges for treatment at the smelter not to exceed $10 per ton all told. That leaves a net profit of $3,700 every working day, or $1,110,000 net profit for the year, allowing ample time for necessary shutdowns and holidays. This is sufficient to pay 110 per cent on the par valuation of a stock you can buy today for 20 cents per share. And this is only one-tenth of what they should easily do.

Because of the tremendous amount of development that has been done and in view of the actual results obtained, it has become necessary to again advance the price of stock in this company at an early date.

The stock sells now for 20 cents per share, but if cash is sent in advance with order, a cash discount of 5 per cent is allowed, making it cost only 19 cents a share. No less than 200 shares are sold to any one person, but $5.00 cash and $5.00 per month for four months will buy this amount of stock; more in proportion.

We wish to urge all our readers to invest in this stock now while they have the chance. We would advise that subscriptions be sent by telegraph stating number of shares wanted and whether on the cash or installment plan, and that the money be sent by the first mail. There is no risk in buying this stock as it is sold under a positive guarantee to resell if the buyer wishes any time within one year, at the highest market price. Quick action is necessary. All letters, telegrams, etc., should be sent to J. Renwick Preston, 1st First National Bank Bldg., Chicago, Ill. Mr. Preston is the treasurer of the National Mortgage & Bond Company, who have charge of this stock. Their own money is in it and every one can look for a square deal and straightforward treatment. This is a good chance to make money quickly and with safety.

Logical Deduction.

Mifflkins—Here is a photograph of my wife. What do you think of it?

Bifflkins—It's certainly a pretty picture, but it doesn't look much like her. I suppose it represents her before taking.

Mifflkins—Before taking what?

Bifflkins—You.

In 1950.

Her—I hear the Newells have separated. Do you know the cause of it?

Him—Yes. She insisted on going to her club twice a week, so he went home to his father.

JOKES AND

Snubbed by His Employer

Workingman—I've been and got married, sir, and I'd like you to raise my wages.

Employer—Very sorry for you, but I'm only responsible for accidents that occur in the works.

Noiseless Screams.

Edyth—Jack Huggins actually had the impudence to kiss me last night.

Mayme—The idea! Of course you tried to scream?

Edyth—Yes—every time.

Urban Ignorance.

Mrs. Hayfork (who had summer boarders)—Yes, Mrs. Hayseed, the ig'rance of city folks about country life is just amazin'. Ye know I had two families from New York last season.

Mrs. Hayseed—Yes. I seed 'em galavantin' around.

Mrs. Hayfork—Well, it's an actual fact, them people brought tooth brushes with 'em, just as if we were such savages out here as not to have sich a simple thing as a tooth brush in the house.

"Yes, Arthur is so thoughtless in some ways; I frequently have to ask him to spare my blushes!"

"Surely he doesn't attempt to wipe them off, does he?"

Irate Parent—Here! What is all this racket?

Bobby—Please, papa, we are playing a train of cars and I am the locomotive.

Irate Parent—You are the locomotive, eh? Well, I think I'll just switch you.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY.

I have berries, grapes, peaches and apples now in full bearing, and as much ahead. Do not hoe or mow the fruit; just put it up cold, keeps perfectly fresh and costs almost nothing. Last year I sold directions to over 130 families in one week. As there are many people poor, like myself, I feel it my duty to give you my experience, feeling confident any one can make $100 a month home in a few days. I will mail both of fresh and full directions to any of your readers for $1. Send stamps, to cover cost of bottle, fruit, mailing, etc. Address Francis N. Turner, 1910 to 172 Eighth Avenue, New York. Let people see and taste the fruit and you should sell hundreds of directions at $1 each.

Smoketown's Seal.

They met on the rim of a golden cloud.

"Get turned down?" queried the shade who was on his way up.

"Yes," sighed the shade who was on his way down. "St. Peter found out I was from Pittsburg."

"And now in the world did he find that out?"

"Why, I absent-mindedly offered him a stogy."

"Surely he doesn't attempt to wipe them off, does he?"

Ostend's Idea.

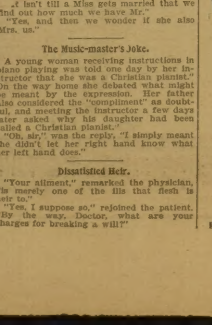
Teacher—Ostend, can you tell us anything about the wooden horse of Troy?

Ostend—The wooden horse of Troy? Why, ma'am, I suppose if it was a wooden horse it must have been a sawhorse.

Information Wanted.

Green—Can't I sell you my automobile?

Brown—Which is broke—you are the machine?



"It isn't till a Miss gets married that we find out how much we have Mr."

"Yes, and then we wonder if she also Mrs. us."

The Music-master's Joke.

A young woman receiving instructions in piano playing was told one day by her instructor that she was a Christian pianist. On the way home she debated what might be meant by the expression. Her father also considered the "compliment" as doubtful, and meeting the instructor a few days later asked why his daughter had been called a Christian pianist.

"Oh, sir," was the reply, "I simply meant she didn't let her right hand know what her left hand does."

Dissatisfied Heir.

"Your ailment," remarked the physician, "is merely one of the ills that flesh is heir to."

"Yes, I suppose so," rejoined the patient. "By the way, Doctor, what are your charges for breaking a will?"

TAKING A MEAN ADVANTAGE.

The Young Man—May I take this opportunity, sir, of asking for your daughter's hand?

JOLLITY

HEALTHY SCHOOLMA'AM

Found Out How to Feed Herself.

Many school teachers, at the end of their year's work feel thoroughly exhausted and worn out, physically and mentally. The demand upon the nerves and brain of a teacher is unusual and unless they are well fed and fed upon properly selected food, it is natural that they should run down.

A little woman teacher in Mich., who has been teaching regularly for a number of years, has always found herself thoroughly exhausted at the end of the session, until within the last year, she has made use of Grape-Nuts food with the result that she closed the year as a robust, healthy, strong, vigorous woman, having gained in weight from 99 pounds to 125; her nerves strong, face bright and cheery, and really a wonder to all her friends, who constantly comment on her color and strength. She knows exactly to what the change is attributed, for in the years past, living on ordinary food, she has almost broken down before the school year closed, whereas since using Grape-Nuts, this change has been brought about; evidence prima facie of the value of Grape-Nuts food for rebuilding the brain and nerve centers. "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville" in pkgs.

A Foolish Question.

Lawyer—Now, see here; before I take your case I want to know if you are guilty.

Client—Do you suppose I'd be fool enough to come to the most expensive lawyer in the town if I was innocent?

Too Rare.

Guest—Can you tell me what that chap with the long hair is doing over there?

Proprietor—Is monsieur deaf? Zat is one great musician imported from Paree.

Guest—Is eh? Well, he is like this beef you just served me.

Proprietor—How is zat, monsieur?

Guest—Why, he is raw and needs plenty of roasting.

A Keen Thrust.

Miss Vane—I don't know that man very well, but I understand that he's been telling every one how wonderfully well preserved my complexion is.

Miss Knox—Probably he's an agent for it.

Brakeman—This is the fourth time I have thrown you off this freight.

Sandy Pikes—So it is, boss, and I was just thinking that you should be in Russia.

Brakeman—Why so?

Sandy Pikes—'Cause you are such a good bum thrower.

New Idea.

The Caller—What is your husband doing at present?

Inventor's Wife—Oh, he is trying to perfect a shipless airship.

The Cook's Opinion.

Friend—Is the bride you are working for getting to be a good housekeeper?

Cook—No, she hasn't learned to keep out of the kitchen yet.

He—Will you be my wife?

She—Before giving you my answer, I would like to know if your income is sufficient to pay me the alimony to which I have always been accustomed.

Comforting the Condemned.

"I have," said the lawyer, as he entered his condemned client's cell, "good news at last."

"A reprieve?" eagerly exclaimed the prisoner.

"No, not a reprieve; but your uncle has left you three thousand dollars, and now you can meet your fate with the satisfying feeling that the noble efforts of your lawyer in your behalf will not go unrewarded."

Didn't Like the Job.

A washerwoman applied to a gentleman for work, and he gave her a note to the manager of a certain club. It read as follows:

"Dear Mr. X——: This woman wants washing."

Very shortly afterward the answer came back:

"Dear Sir: I dare say she does; but I don't fancy the job."

Maid—He hasn't slept for five days, doctor.

Doctor—Is that so? What's the reason?

Maid—He sleeps at night, tee hee!

No Minus Quantities in Her Algebra.

He—They say apple pie without cheese is like a kiss without a squeeze. Do you believe it?

She—I'm not prepared to judge; I've never had a kiss without a squeeze.

AGENTS WANTED

Nearly all the readers of THE LEDGER will find these advertisements of interest to them. There will be found among them some excellent chances of making money by selling goods to friends, neighbors and others. Those seeking such an opportunity either as a regular or temporary occupation, should write the advertisers whose offers follow.

MOVING PICTURES

VERY LATEST POCKET NOVELTY. Each contains 25 Miniature Photographic Pictures, which represent Horse Pictures exactly like those shown in Theatrical and Kinetoscope. Agents' Packet mailed. Send for 25c, stamps or silver. Mention this paper. Chas. E. Smith, 209 Nassau St., New York City

$150. A MONTH PROFIT E. E. ROBERTS, agent, write Kinetic Chair, YOU CAN EARN IT. KINETIC CHAIR CO., 34 Fifth Ave., Chicago, Ill.

"NO BURN" STOVE POLISH. Sample free. ENTERPRISE STAMPING CO., ANDOVER, N. Y.

AGENTS CHICKET, Perfumes, Flavors, etc. Big profits. Repeat orders. Experience unnecessary. HERBERT AGENCY CO., Box 202, Station L, New York

SELL TOBACCO AND CIGARS. Middle or traveling. Salary or commission. Full time or side line. Steady work. Good pay. Promotion. Address MERCHANTS TOBACCO CO., Box 363, DANVILLE, Va.

SOUVENIR POST CARDS for Independence Day made from any Photo sent to us. Sample 10c. Catalogue free. FOTO SOUVENIR CO., 120 Hudson St., Hoboken, N. J.

$100 A MONTH and traveling expenses paid man to place Pepto-Protein (for stock and poultry) with farmers. Experience unnecessary. A. DABEL CO., PARSONS, Kansas.

AGENTS PORTRAITS 85c, FRAMES 15c, 16x20 inches. Sheet Pictures, Stereoscopes, Stereoscopic Views. Catalog free. Consolidated Portrait Co., 290-96 W. Adams St., Chicago.

$90.00 A MONTH salary and additional commission; local managers, men to advertise and distribute samples to consumers; no canvassing; position permanent; $3 horse furnished; expenses advanced. STANDARD SILVER CO., Dept. 8, Fifth Ave., CHICAGO, ILL.

MAKE MONEY QUICK $2.00 to $10.00 a day selling our exclusive specialties. You can do it at home or on the road. Particulars free. Write today. Address Specialties Agency, 79 Dearborn Street, Chicago

AUTOMATIC FISH HOOKS Catches two fish to common hook's one. Fish are caught in more localities hook. Write today for our 10th BOOK FREE. Mer. Agents wanted. Hook Specialty Co., Dept. 46, Des Moines, Ia.

AGENTS $50 PER WEEK WANTED To sell the Dr. Haux famous "Perfect Vision" Spectacles—Rimless—Most comfortable. Write Dr. Haux Spectacle Co., Dept. 1188, St. Louis.

Energetic Men Wanted

in every locality throughout the United States to advertise our goods, tacking up showcards in town, fences and along roads, also distributing small advertising matter; permanent work; $3 per day and expenses paid; will increase $4 per day. Steady employment, no experience necessary. Write for particulars. Address WM. R. WARNER MEDICINE CO., London, Kentucky.

WE WANT AGENTS

in every town to take orders for Custom made Suits, All Wool Fabrics, Fit Guaranteed, Large profits and commissions paid and exclusive territory. Complete sample case furnished free to those who can do business. You can make big money working for us. Write at once for Sample Outfit. The Warrington W. & W. Mills, Dept. 509, 179 Lincoln Ave., Chicago.

AGENTS Here is the chance for wide awake young men. Free Book on the spot. It will tell you how to make $75.00 to $150.00 per month. Without fail the quickest profession will be found in the sale of our new method of no-to-date work. No stock to buy. No stock to carry. No stock to order. No stock to sell. No stock to buy. No stock to carry. No stock to order. No stock to sell. No stock to buy. No stock to carry. No stock to order. No stock to sell

THE MYSTERIOUS GOVERNESS.

BY ADRIENNE ROUCOLLE.

[Copyright by the Author.]

Begun in No. 19, May 11. Subscriptions can begin with this issue, and back copies can be obtained from news stands, or our agents, or by mail from office of publication.

CHAPTER XIII.

GONE!

The dinner was far from gay, for a current of unrest filled the air and depressed the heart. The sky had been overcast all afternoon, but now it had become a perfect sea of tossing, rolling clouds, while a death-like silence reigned everywhere. Suddenly, just as the guests were passing from the dining-room into the drawing-room, the storm broke. A flash of light-ning rent the sky and lit the whole park in a lurid glare, then the hoarse voice of the thunder broke the portentous silence. The wind, as though waiting this signal, burst forth with such fury as to nearly uproot the giant trees in the park, while the rain fell in torrents.

"What an awful storm!" exclaimed Madame de Longville nervously, as she drew near her daughter in a maternal instinct of protection.

Berthe had gone to look out, but soon the sight of the continually dashing lightning caused her to turn white-faced from the window, saying:

"I never saw lightning at this time of year. It is perfectly terrifying."

Lord Davanhoe rose and walked to where she stood, saying to her, as he looked out with interest on the scene without:

"These electric storms, Mademoiselle, though not frequent, are the rule at least after a specially dry year. The last season has been remarkable for its lack of moisture and tonight we are paying for the subcharged condition of the atmosphere. You are not afraid?" he asked, seeing her shiver.

"I can't say that I am not," she replied frankly.

Monsieur Bourdier, seeing the ladies' nervousness increased every minute at each new peal of thunder, turned to Berthe, saying:

"The best way to calm your fears, Berthe, is to play for us. It will aid us to pass the time until the storm abates."

Berthe did as she was bidden, glad of an occupation to hide from the others her ever-increasing terror.

Isabelle, seated by her lover, though nervous like the others, felt in the open presence of the man she loved a sense of protection which left her fearless that usual. Hence de Longville, on the contrary, was visibly frightened. Her recent illness and the weakened condition in which this had left her nerves made her more sensitive to atmospheric disturbance. As to Madame Bourdier, her desire to appear calm was great, but she could scarcely think of the storm. All, however, welcomed Monsieur Bourdier's suggestion and the first notes of the piano seemed to soothe for an instant their excitement.

But every minute the storm seemed to redouble in fury and soon the crashing of the thunder and the dashing of the rain were so violent that the sound of the piano was too feeble to overcome the howl of the tempest.

At last Berthe rose from the instrument and spoke to her father, saying:

"Papa, if I wasn't so frightened I would like to go up to Mademoiselle Dobart's room and see if she doesn't want any one to keep her company."

"You are right," exclaimed Isabelle, rising. "How selfish of me to have forgotten her! I'll go and see what's in this frightful storm! Berthe, I will go up with you."

Nestor, who had also risen at the mention of the governess, said:

"No, Isabelle, remain where you are. You two girls would be frightened to death going up the stairs alone. I will accompany Berthe as far as Mademoiselle Dobart's room and leave her there."

When the two had left the room, Madame Bourdier turned to Madame de Longville, saying:

"This Mademoiselle Dobart is a treasure and we are broken-hearted at the thought that her failing health forces her to leave us. I never had a chance to thank your sister for recommending her to me."

"My sister, which? Madame de Bois-Fleury?"

"Certainly," answered Madame, "since I am not so fortunate as to have met Lady Davanhoe."

Lord Davanhoe turned around from his contemplation of the storm at the mention of that name. Jacques listened to reply, after casting an uneasy glance toward his brother-in-law.

"I had forgotten that you did not know my sister, Madame, but how does it come that Madame de Bois-Fleury knew this governess?"

Madame Bourdier looked at the young man in surprise, then said:

"Why, was she not her governess before coming here? I am speaking of Mademoiselle Adriana Dobart."

"Adriana!" that name before, Madame. As to my sisters, neither ever spoke of governesses, as I remember, and our mother's death both were placed in the convent of the Sacre-Coeur in Paris."

"What!" and Madame Bourdier rose from here chair more terrified by this news than she had been by the storm. "Your sister never had a governess! Why, she came here herself to visit the governess about a month after we had hired her because of the high recommendations she had brought from Madame de Bois-Fleury! And now, now, you tell me this is all a lie! Then who is the woman who was passing herself Madame de Bois-Fleury, who wrote that letter? But, now I think of this woman who for the last six months has had the care of my daughters—"

Madame Bourdier was comically tragic in her consternation, while she talked so rapidly that no one was able to express his astonishment. Monsieur Bourdier was almost as unequal as his wife to the new discovery, while Isabelle recalled with a start Adriana's words when she had told her that a friend would soon come when she would know her awful secret.

Lord Davanhoe had listened to the conversation at first with indifference, but the mention of Adriana's name made him start violently, while his eyes flashed with a sudden hope. He turned to Madame Bourdier and when she paused for lack of words to express her indignation, he seized her arm roughly by the arm, asking in panting tones:

"You said her name was Adriana?"

Surprised, almost frightened, by his wild manner and eager eyes, Madame Bourdier replied:

"Yes, Adriana Dobart."

"Describe her," he ordered in quick, terse tones, which Madame Bourdier could open her mouth to reply, he continued: "What age, what color hair, what is the face of a Madonna, eyes of midnight darkness, hair black and curling?"

Jacques had risen and hurrying to his brother-in-law, said soothingly:

"Come, Raymond, pardon over your troubles will turn your reason. What mad hope has found birth in your diseased mind?"

Trembling, wild, of a ghostly pallor, Lord Davanhoe answered:

"Let me be, Jacques! In Heaven's name let her answer! Is it, is it possible that—that?"

"Yes, she is very beautiful and her hair and eyes are dark," began Madame Bourdier, more astonished than ever.

A cry of joy broke from Lord Davanhoe as he loosened his convulsive hold on her arm. Overcome by his emotion, he cried as he sank on a nearby chair:

"I have found her! She is neither false nor dead. Oh God,-how can I thank Thee!"

The above words, the last of which so rapidly that none of the witnesses had been able to comprehend either a word or figure any one had time to recover from his surprise, Berthe, pale and wild-eyed, rushed into the room, crying:

"She has gone! Mademoiselle Dobart has left in the awful storm. She will be killed!"

CHAPTER XIV.

THE REVELATION.

Berthe's words caused all the listeners to rise in consternation, shocked as they were by the news that a human creature was alone, battling with the elements, but Lord Davanhoe became the one the most effected by the news, for he stared wild-eyed and livid at the young girl, as though his brain could not grasp the awful meaning of her words. Madame de Longville, Monsieur and Jacques had hastened to the stricken man as though they feared the agony of the shock would prove greater than his strength. In fact, for a while, such seemed to be the case, for he swayed and reeled about to fall, his breath came panting, while his wild eyes had a look in them incomprehensive stare. Suddenly his faculties seemed to return, for with a cry of despair, he turned to the young girl and questioned breathlessly:

"Gone, gone! Do you mean to say that she is gone?"

Frightened by his disheveled aspect, Berthe stammered:

"Are you speaking of Mademoiselle Dobart?"

He nodded his head, unable to utter another word. Berthe answered, as unconsciously she moved away from the man whose wild eyes filled her with terror:

"Yes, she is gone. We have hunted everywhere. She is not in the castle."

At that moment Nestor appeared at the door. His face had lost much of its waning color, while his anxious eyes were filled with remorse and dread. His fell guilty. Knowing as he did her tragic secret, he should have warned her in time and not forced her to make her escape during that night of tempest. On seeing him, Lord Davanhoe questioned:

"Have you found her?"

Nestor shook his head, as he answered: "She is not in the castle. I have looked everywhere. What worries me is to know if she left soon enough before the storm to have reached some place of safety before it broke."

"She pretended to be so ill," remarked Madame Bourdier peevishly. "She was in a swoon while lately over an hour and from which we feared we could never wake her. I can't see how she could have had the strength to leave. As to the reason of her sudden departure in such weather, it is beyond my comprehension."

"Oh, I understand!" broke in Lord Davanhoe, with a bitter laugh. "She left because she did not wish to see me. She risked all in order that she might not face with the man who loves her to madness."

"Oh, Monsieur!" exclaimed Madame Bourdier, shocked by this bold avowal, "you a married man!"

Lord Davanhoe laughed in a nervous, hysterical, heart-breaking way, then replied:

"You are shocked because you do not know this woman."

But Jacques hastened to interrupt:

"Raymond! You rave! This is worse than madness. I can guess what mad thought has entered your brain, but it is folly to suppose that Adriana is the original description you gave Madame Bourdier could have fitted a thousand women in France who are tall, whose hair and eyes are black."

"Is that name of Adriana!" objected Lord Davanhoe.

"It is a common in France, I'll admit, but more than one woman in a population of several millions can have a similar given name and surname. It would be an unusual one," objected Jacques.

Lord Davanhoe, with his hands to his brow in a gesture which bespoke the tumult of his soul, replied hoarsely:

"Oh, for some way to set these fears at rest, some means to be sure that my heart had not deceived me! For more than a year ago it said: 'It is she, you have found her at last!'"

He was such a pitiful sight that Nestor felt he must and should know the truth and advancing a few steps toward Lord Davanhoe, he said:

"You have doubts at rest, Lord Davanhoe. You are not deceived. The lady, who for six months has been under the roof of our home as a governess, was indeed your wife, Lady Davanhoe."

Jacques and Madame Bourdier's astonishment was so great that they looked at each other, but before a word escaped the lips of lost his reason, while Isabelle had now the explanation of what Adriana had meant when she had told her that she would soon know her secret. Jacques, Madame de Longville and Monsieur Bourdier were also too moved by this unexpected revelation to weigh carefully what this news would have upon Lord Davanhoe. Berthe alone did not even seem surprised. Her grief at the loss of her governess was so great that nothing else mattered to her.

Lord Davanhoe, after the first moment of overpowering emotion, found his voice enough to ask:

"Then since she was my wife, yet you did not tell me?"

"I had given my word of honor to keep her secret and it surely is not Lord Davanhoe who will blame me for having kept my word," answered Nestor quietly.

"Never mind that now," and a new fever took possession of Lord Davanhoe. "You know where she is, you came to betray her secret. The main thing now is to go to the rescue of the unfortunate whose desertion by me has led to death!"

"Yes," cried Jacques, "we must find her. Oh, what a blind, heartless fool I have been!"

Monsieur Bourdier, Boursier, if you had only spoken!" and the two men walked toward the door.

But Nestor barred the way.

"Gentlemen," he said, "this is madness! You can not go until the storm abates."

"Stand aside!" Lord Davanhoe's eyes blazed fire. "Not go, when I know that the woman I love, my wife, is alone in that fearful storm! Nestor, Nestor, there is not a man strong enough to hinder me. Once more, stand aside, or I will answer not of wishing to protect me, cause me to forget that I am your guest."

"He is right," said Jacques, as eager as his brother-in-law to go to the rescue. "It would be cowardly to remain here while we know that a woman is alone battling with the elements, nay, perhaps in need of help. Remember, Monsieur, she is my wife and a sister."

"I have not forgotten it," slowly replied the young man without moving a step from the door, "and it is because I do remember that I cannot allow you to go, that until this storm ceases no one shall leave this room."

"Monsieur," began Lord Davanhoe in threatening tones, but Nestor continued:

"Calm your excitement for an instant, Messieurs, and listen to reason. You wish to find Lady Davanhoe. Very well! but have you the slightest idea who direction she has taken by what road she has fled? During a storm, like the one now raging, you might pass a dozen times by the one you are seeking and not suspect her presence. Your calls would be drowned in the howl of the winds or the crash of the thunder, her cries for help would not be heard even though the rescuers were only a few feet away. To go now would be simply to endanger your own lives without helping her, nay, rather, crippling all future attempts at rescue, since we would have three to seek instead of one and thus divide our forces instead of concentrating them on one search."

Jacques understood the justice of these remarks, for he let himself drop back disengaged of all hair, while his head dropped on his hands.

"He is right! But the agony of waiting! Poor, poor Adriana, alone in this tempest!"

Isabelle, for once forgetting her maidenly reserve in her desire to soothe the young man's grief, went up to him and with a gentle gesture full of tender compassion, caressed his bowed head, saying softly:

"Don't despair, Jacques. God is merciful, He will protect her and she will be returned safely to you."

Nestor saw that Lord Davanhoe hesitated, laid his hand on his shoulder in a compassionate gesture, while he continued:

"Monsieur, Lord Davanhoe, by reason and don't attempt a thing which would result in failure, if not in death. Believe me, if it had been possible to follow her, I would not be here advising inaction. Your mother, my friend, as much as anger as any, I would be seeking for the unfortunate lady myself at the same time ago I swore to protect."

Lord Davanhoe started back, a sudden suspicion flashing through his mind, causing his heart to cease beating in an agony of fear. But the look in Nestor's honest speechless, then advancing anew toward the young man, he asked in hoarse tones:

"You—you are not the man with whom she was flying, the man she claimed to—" he was choking.

"No, Lord Nestor, "no, Lord Davanhoe. You wrong me and you insult her whose only fault was to love you too well. She was alone on finding you false to find a revenge suitable to the offense."

The young man spoke in such low tones that none but Lord Davanhoe could hear them. More surprised than ever, he asked:

"How do you know this?"

Nestor replied that he herself on the morning after my return home for the summer vacation. I met her by chance and was startled by her striking resemblance to her sister, Madame de Bois-Fleury. She told me the truth."

Lord Davanhoe remained an instant lost in thought, then without another word he walked to the large French window which opened on the park, and there, with his eyes fixed on the storm without, he remained motionless and rigid.

The minutes dragged by in the most oppressive silence. No one thought or dared to speak. Their hearts were filled with possible fate of the unfortunate woman battling alone in the storm. Suddenly Lord Davanhoe gave a cry and opening wide the windows, he rushed into the night, crying:

"I saw her! I saw her!"

CHAPTER XV.

IN THE STORM.

When Adriana found herself alone, after having thought he had been accused by the unexpected sight of her husband and her lover, she sank down overcome upon a chair. So great had been the shock that for a while she could not even think, but her brain seemed to be overwhelmed in that blissful torpor which gave to her weary nerves a moment's rest.

But suddenly she leaped to her feet with a hoarse cry, for it was in the house, that I know that she was here also, then he would come up and she would be forced to see him face to face.

"Never, never!" she cried as she rushed to the door and locked it. "Oh, God, will I consent to see him again! Death in preference to that. I know my weakness, should I plead for pardon, my love pete would yield to my love and I should forgive. Never! Let the tempest rage, I find from him the first time: it is the reason why I must remain tonight. Yes, that is it. I must get away from here before they discover my real identity."

She was in a situation now. Nervously she paced the room seeking for the means of objects and to take with her, talking as she walked:

"I can best make my escape when they are at dinner. I will wait until I hear the dining-room and the servants in the kitchen. No one will see me."

A knock at the door caused her to start violently and she paused, panting, wild, in the center of the room.

"It is I, Berthe," said a voice without, "I have a letter from my brother Gerald who has just returned home."

Still suspicious, Adriana advanced to the door, but before opening she asked:

"Berthe, before I open the door, swear to me that you are alone, that this is not a trap."

VITALITY Exhausted or Debilitated from Any Cause
Restored at Home
You can secure the confidential advice of an expert Doctor and Specialist of many years' standing, by writing him without charge. Dr. Bobertz's Treatment is guaranteed a True Nerve Food, acting Nature to restore nerve force and perfect vitality. Nervous Nervous and Blood Diseases speedily and thoroughly cured by original methods. Write to-day, confidential and mail to be sure of obtaining honorable and successful treatment, address
DR. G. H. BOBERTZ,
560 Woodward Ave. Detroit, Mich.
Established in Detroit since 1896.

Gold Watch AND RING FREE
Write a Steam-Wind, Gold-Filled Watch, guaranteed 20 years, and a Solid Gold Wedding Ring, guaranteed 25 years, both sent FREE to any one who will sell 20 packages of our Bluing at 10c per package. Write us and we will send the bluing postpaid; when sold send us $2.00 and we will send you the watch and ring by return mail. Address, WORLD MFG. CO., 1 to 9 Jackson Blvd., Dept. 1, CHICAGO, ILL.

Penn
RHEUMATISM
Cure
RELIABLE QUAKER REMEDY
Guaranteed absolutely free from dangerous acids under Serial No. 430 by the Government at Washington, D. C.
Write for a generous sample box of Penn Rheumatism Cure, the great uric acid destroyer. CAN AWAY ALL HESITATION. Write for absolutely free sample.
PENN DRUG CO., Philadelphia, Pa.

"I am alone," replied the young girl, more and more surprised at the governess' strange actions. "What do you fear?"

Instead of replying, Adriana opened the door and Berthe entered. She was more shocked than ever at the awful change those few hours of suffering had brought on the lived face before her, and after giving her the letter she again pleaded to be allowed to remain with the governess.

"No, Berthe," firmly replied Adriana, "all I need is rest. I was just going to lie down when you entered. I shall be strongly well after a good night's rest," and after saying her good night again, Adriana pushed her from the room and locked the door.

Once alone she hastened to read Nestor's letter. It brought to her some feeling of security, but it did not entirely allay her fears, for she said:

"He will do the best he can to protect me, of that I am sure, but let Lord Davaine be taught who I am and nothing short of death would stop him from seeing me. No, my plan is the best—I must escape before it is too late."

Her preparations were soon completed and she sat down to wait for the second dinner-bell; then she would make her escape and never more this home where she was learning to forget her m . . . ry, thought of her parents, whom she h learned to love so deeply, brought hot tears to her eyes and she murmured:

"They will regret my departure, for I believe I have succeeded in winning their respect, if not their love, but they will soon think when they know all? Berthe, I know you approve of anything I do, but Isabelle, with her deranged ideas of right and wrong, will she approve my action? And she not that I have acted in my duty and have allowed my resentment to get the best of me.

For a while she thought, then rising, determined light in her . . . . . she walked to the writing desk and took out writing mat . . . .

"No, she must not blame me . . . I write as a farewell to her and a warning to Jacques just what I have suffered and what new feelings of dying love, of wounded pride and outraged wickedness which forced me to leave the home who had betrayed my trust."

Rapidly she wrote, and as page after page was filled with the torment feelings of her broken heart, her face assumed the varied expressions of the thoughts her pen traced. At last, with a sigh, she threw down her pen and gathering the scattered pages, folded them and sealed them in an envelope without rereading. This she addressed to Isabelle and, rising, walked to the window. The night was dark and tossing banks of clouds which obscured the skies spoke of the coming tempest. But this storm, which at another time would have filled her with terror, she welcomed with joy, for it was in harmony with the tempest of her own heart.

At last the dinner-bell sounded. She stepped out into the hall and waited until the guests were in the dining-room and the servants had gone to the kitchen. Then, cautiously, her breath bated, her heart swelling with emotion, she descended the stairs and noiselessly opened the door and was out in the pitchy darkness of the night. Still she was not afraid. The darkness about her filled her with a delightful sense of security, while the silence of the storm-laden air hushed for an instant the despairing throbbings of her heart.

As she passed by the lighted windows of the dining-room, a maddening desire to look in, to see them all again before she left their lives forever, seized her, but she tried to resist, but in vain. Those lighted windows attracted her as a light does the moth. Nearer and nearer she drew, then, at the risk of being seen, she raised herself on the tips of her toes and looked in. A cry died in her throat. The first face her eyes fell upon encountered was that of her husband who sat facing the window. How changed it was, how pale and sorrow-laden! What suffering in the eyes! For an instant she remained spellbound by the sight, the next she had lowered her hold on the window-sill and was running wildly down the avenue, not knowing where she went, fearful from the phantom of the wreck her unholy vengeance had made of the man she had promised to love, honor and obey.

The storm broke, but she did not heed it. She lightly flashed around her and she laughed—the laugh of madness. To the voice of the thunder she hurled back the screams of her despair. On she ran. The wind pushed her along, buffeting her face and scattering about her the mass of her loosened hair. The rain poured down in torrents, but she did not feel the cold drops which had already soaked her clothes. In the unnatural excitement of her overwrought nerves, all the minor events of life were annulled. She could think of nothing, see nothing but that face of which sorrow had left so deep a mark.

On she ran, straight before her, little knowing or caring where she went. A more furious gust of wind hurled her to the ground, but she rose again and continued her mad run, panting, her strength fast giving away under the awful strain of her battle against the elements. Again she fell and this time it was with more difficulty that she regained her footing on the slippery ground and resumed her recognizance. At last it was impossible for her to go further, and breathless, spent both in body and in spirit, she sank at the foot of a great oak and lay there on the ground . . . to rise.

"Is this death?" the pale lips murmured. Then, as her consciousness seemed leaving her and the storm broke with . . . with a fresh breath, "Raymond, I pardon."

CHAPTER XVI.

FOUND.

When Jacques . . . Charmeuse saw his . . . ed . . . answer through the . . . French window after making the . . . final announcement that he had . . . missing woman, he rushed to the window and would have thrown it open, had not Nestor pulled him back, saying:

"What are you going to do, Charmeuse? Follow this madwoman and perhaps . . . other victim to the . . . ?"

"But she will be . . . killed . . . he said this.

"Simply an hallucination caused by his . . . wrought brain, that is all," replied Nestor as he closed the window. "Lady Davanhoe must have left at le we were at dinner and could have been . . . before the storm broke. How could any . . . posted by this window see more than . . . or four rods in the darkness of . . . my poor Jacques, Lord Day . . . did not realize what a . . . has gone, which will make our future searches all the more . . . "

"But it . . . the Charmeuse . . . "Why . . . out there alone . . . ad that wo . . . s not . . . s . . . ?"

"A thou and the . . . would I rather be . . . there than to . . . mad . . . heart shattered and . . . "

In looking out into the night, saw that the storm had abated and that it was not deemed possible for them . . . the . . . ch, so he turned to Jacques . . . y . . . y well, let us get ready, then we will see what we can do."

The women crowded about the two young men who were about to be scattered by Monsieur Boursier, and tried to detain them, fearing as they did the coming of the hour, that harm would befall . . . Some time was consumed in pacifying them. Nestor and Jacques had felt that it would be some time before they would be ready, and that the storm would have ceased by that time. To his mother he said:

"Mother, have the servants build a fire in the sitting-room and have it made warmed. Out in the rain for two hou . . . he will be chilled to the bone." His father he asked to telephone for the doctor in case his services might be required.

Then followed by Jacques he went to the kitchen where the servants were assembled and ordered them to open the door and coats and prepare to take part in the hunt for the missing woman. The instructions were given in a clear, concise manner, for Nestor's religious emotion of the first moments had given place to a calm determination to find the unfortunate and save her if it was not already too late.

While the servants were carrying out his orders, Nestor had been quickly preparing for the search, he conducted Jacques to his room and forced him to change his evening suit for a leather hunting costume through which the rain would not penetrate.

This done the young men descended into the main hall where they found the servants impatiently awaiting to make traveling possible, had gone to his room and changed his clothes. Then, well armed, from the photom of the wreck her unholy vengeance had made of the man she had promised to love, honor and obey.

The storm broke, but she did not heed it. She lightly flashed around her and she laughed—the laugh of madness. To the voice of the thunder she hurled back the screams of her despair. On she ran. The wind pushed her along, buffeting her face and scattering about her the mass of her loosened hair. The rain poured down in torrents, but she did not feel the cold drops which had already soaked her clothes. In the unnatural excitement of her overwrought nerves, all the minor events of life were annulled. She could think of nothing, see nothing but that face of which sorrow had left so deep a mark.

On she ran, straight before her, little knowing or caring where she went. A more furious gust of wind hurled her to the ground, but she rose again and continued her mad run, panting, her strength fast giving away under the awful strain of her battle against the elements. Again she fell and this time it was with more difficulty that she regained her footing on the slippery ground and resumed her recognizance. At last it was impossible for her to go further, and breathless, spent both in body and in spirit, she sank at the foot of a great oak and lay there on the ground . . . to rise.

"Is this death?" the pale lips murmured. Then, as her consciousness seemed leaving her and the storm broke with . . . with a fresh breath, "Raymond, I pardon."

CHAPTER XVI.

FOUND.

When Jacques . . . Charmeuse saw his . . . ed . . . answer through the . . . French window after making the . . . final announcement that he had . . . missing woman, he rushed to the window and would have thrown it open, had not Nestor pulled him back, saying:

"What are you going to do, Charmeuse? Follow this madwoman and perhaps . . . other victim to the . . . ?"

"But she will be . . . killed . . . he said this.

"Simply an hallucination caused by his . . . wrought brain, that is all," replied Nestor as he closed the window. "Lady Davanhoe must have left at le we were at dinner and could have been . . . before the storm broke. How could any . . . posted by this window see more than . . . or four rods in the darkness of . . . my poor Jacques, Lord Day . . . did not realize what a . . . has gone, which will make our future searches all the more . . . "

"But it . . . the Charmeuse . . . "Why . . . out there alone . . . ad that wo . . . s not . . . s . . . ?"

"A thou and the . . . would I rather be . . . there than to . . . mad . . . heart shattered and . . . "

In looking out into the night, saw that the storm had abated and that it was not deemed possible for them . . . the . . . ch, so he turned to Jacques . . . y . . . y well, let us get ready, then we will see what we can do."

The women crowded about the two young men who were about to be scattered by Monsieur Boursier, and tried to detain them, fearing as they did the coming of the hour, that harm would befall . . . Some time was consumed in pacifying them. Nestor and Jacques had felt that it would be some time before they would be ready, and that the storm would have ceased by that time. To his mother he said:

"Mother, have the servants build a fire in the sitting-room and have it made warmed. Out in the rain for two hou . . . he will be chilled to the bone." His father he asked to telephone for the doctor in case his services might be required.

Then followed by Jacques he went to the kitchen where the servants were assembled and ordered them to open the door and coats and prepare to take part in the hunt for the missing woman. The instructions were given in a clear, concise manner, for Nestor's religious emotion of the first moments had given place to a calm determination to find the unfortunate and save her if it was not already too late.

While the servants were carrying out his orders, Nestor had been quickly preparing for the search, he conducted Jacques to his room and forced him to change his evening suit for a leather hunting costume through which the rain would not penetrate.

This done the young men descended into the main hall where they found the servants impatiently awaiting to make traveling possible, had gone to his room and changed his clothes. Then, well armed, from the photom of the wreck her unholy vengeance had made of the man she had promised to love, honor and obey.

"Say, father, you are not going!"

"Well, Nestor upon seeing him . . . "Some one must go with . . . to . . . ling old . . . "Then let it be some one else," replied Monsieur Boursier, in a tone of determination in his tones that there was no opposing him. "I will not . . . to endanger the life of that poor girl not to assist in the search."

Nestor did not argue further, but rapidly began giving his instructions to the little group of young men and his father, Jacques, his father, Jacques and himself. They would divide in four parties, each taking a different direction, each supplied with a hunting horn which they would blow at regular intervals. Should one of the four parties succeed in locating the missing woman three blasts of the trumpet repeated three times would announce the fact and summon the others to their assistance, while one of the men in the party would return to the house to ring the chapel bell. In case the blasts of the trumpet had not been heard.

At last everything was ready and Nestor, who with Jacques was to form one of the searching parties, was walking to the door, when it opened from without and Lord Davanhoe appeared on the sill, but carrying his wife's unconscious form in his arms, a groan escaped the lips of the young . . . ough leaving him now that he had found . . . ecious burden was taken from him, and as he sank exhausted on a divan, he murmured weakly:

"I found her, found her at last!"

The commotion caused by this unexpected return was great and Madame Boursier who had gone upstairs to personally superintend the arrangement of her daughter's chamber, hastened immediately to descend to her husband's assistance, and with the assistance of the former's maid, had Adriana carried to her room. . . . had . . . tried the usual remedies to . . . consciousness, but to no avail, though a slight quiver in the region of the heart indicated . . . Lady Davanhoe still . . . ed the hope . . . ver fluttering of a corpse. Seeing that nothing could be done, Madame Boursier left the room, bidding the . . . ed . . . her favorite niece and, lost in prayers, she waited until it would be possible for the doctor to . . . Madame Boursier and the maid, however, kept on rubbing the rigid limbs and . . . ing unbridled . . . and . . . usual remedies in such cases.

Meanwhile in the hall below all had crowded around Lord Davanhoe, who sat crushed and panting on a chair. After . . . ing . . . ed . . . ed . . . ing . . . ed . . . ing . . . ed . . . ing

2 H.P. Detroit Engine For $29.50
Starts without cranking, no cams, valves or sprockets. Only one moving part. Throttle and spark control. Weighs 60 lbs. Runs all positions. Complete with tank, coil, battery, spark plug, etc. Ready to run a few hours after arrival.
Send for testimonials.
DETROIT ENGINE WORKS, 181 Jefferson Ave., Detroit, Mich.
Send for Free Catalog.

MOTHERS RED-WETTING CURED. Harmless. Book FREE. ALWAYS FREE, Bloomington, Ill.

OPIUM and Liquor Habit cured in 10 to 20 days. No pay till cured. Write Dr. J. E. Stephens Co., Dept. B. 9, Lebanon, Ohio

PATENTS. Send for Inventor's Primer. Wm. E. Harmon & Co., Attys. 220 10th St., Washington, D.C. Established 1865. Branches: Chicago, Cleveland, Detroit

SONG POEMS WANTED, $100 Musical Compositions. We pay Royalty. Publish and copyright. We Compose and Arrange FREE of charge. GEO. JAMES MUSIC CO., 70, 71B, 72, Cincinnati, O.

DETECTIVES Travel and wear; in every community, to act solely for us. Salary $18 per week and expenses. Horse furnished when necessary. Position permanent. Write today for particulars. Address Richard Stanton Institute, 110 Institute Bldg., Kalamazoo, Mich.

X-RAY CATHODOSCOPE Co. Everybody wants it. Tells time on watch through cloth; apparent ly see your future, boat, girl, etc.; see just through clothing, wood or stone any distance; all interesting things; all sent postpaid for 10c. coin, stamps or silver. Address THE X RAYALL CO., Phila., Pa.

LEARN WATCHMAKING Refund profitable labor. Competent men always in demand. Such it you are or your money back. Lessons sent formerly to your home. Tuition reasonable. Positions secured. Money earned while studying. Positions secured. Write today. Send for catalogue. St. Louis Watchmaking School, St. Louis, Mo.

YOUR FORTUNE TOLD FREE Send your residence with birth date and 2 will tell you what you want to know. Be sure to state if Mr. or Miss. Address plainly, stamp and birth, plainly told by 7 sons of Zoroaster. Postpaid and no stamps. PROF. LEO AMED, Dept. 44 BRIDGEPORT, CONN.

FREE 50 NAME CARDS We will print your name and address on 50 CARDS free of charge, if you will agree to hand some of them to your friends. Write today. HARRY ABBEY, D. 358 Dearborn St., Chicago

FITS When I say cured, I mean a radical cure. I have made the disease of FITS, Epilepsy or Falling Sickness a life long study. I warrant my remedy to cure the worst cases. Because others have failed is no reason for not now receiving a cure. Send at once for a treatise and a free bottle of my infallible remedy. Give Express and Post Office. DR. H. G. ROOT, 183 Pearl St., New York

Gold Watch AND RING FREE
Write us for both a Solid Gold Ring and a Solid Gold Watch FREE
Guaranteed 20 years. Write for Free Catalogue and Premium List. Agents Wanted.
NOVELTY WATCH CO., Dept. 4, Chicago

MENDING TISSUE The WONDER of the Age. For sewing or darning. Repairs clothing, silk, satin, cotton or woolen goods, gloves, hosiery, lace curtains, portieres, carpets, oilcloths, parasols, etc. 10c. Package, postpaid. 10 cents. 3 packages, 25 cents. Agents Wanted. Catalogue of Specialties Free. The Home Supply Co., Dept. 4, Lebanon, Pa.

BAND We Supply the U. S. Government. Prices Cut in Half to introduce. Our large new Band Instrument Book sent free. Write today. THE BOOSEY WORLD'S FAIR BAND 20, 24 & 26 E. 4th St., Cincinnati, O. 270 Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Free Sample COPY of COMMERCIAL POULTRY, a journal devoted to the culture of poultry. Issued monthly. Every number contains valuable information for poultrymen. Its articles are prepared by men who have made a success of raising poultry. They tell the reader, in these articles, how to produce the best results with the smallest expenditure. Don't take our word for this. Send for a sample copy and see for yourself. Write to COMMERCIAL POULTRY CO.
Dept. 23, Marseilles, Ill

When answering advertisements you will favor the advertiser and the publishers by mentioning The Chicago Ledger.

BOY'S AND GIRL'S CORNER

THE BALLOON BOYS;

Or, THE WIZARDS OF THE AIR. By COL. LAWRENCE LESLIE.

[Copyright by W. D. Boyce Co.]

CHAPTER I.
THE TWO CHUMS.

The great Sanders Brothers circus was in town, and that section of Michigan fairly seethed with excitement.

All the neighboring board fences were plastered with wonderful colored posters describing the thrilling stunts that were to be witnessed under the canvas at half a dollar a head.

And enthusiast all these grand things that held the rustics spellbound, doubtless the balloon ascension was accounted the chief event.

Lions and elephants were all very well in their way, and even bareback riders might arouse more or less enthusiasm, but for pure, unadulterated daring, the spoils of the two young aeronauts who daily performed all manner of clever gymnastic feats while soaring aloft toward the clouds, took the audience by storm.

The leading spirit of this venturesome couple was a lad whom the wonderful aeronaut, Professor Poole, had chosen.

He had once been a pretty good barback rider himself, and possessed a good deal of wonderful, but this sort of life seemed much too tame to suit the cravings of his bold spirit.

Accordingly Bob had allied himself with the parachute performer, and it was not long before they made up a team that it would have been hard to equal in this whole wide country.

Nor was this change of vocation altogether a freak on Bob's part.

He had long been fascinated by everything connected with aerial navigating machines were his especial hobby, and doubtless in imagination Bob had even already sailed the North Pole through the medium of that marvelous voyager by the upper air current which he expected to invent at some day more or less remote.

It thrilled him to even think of solving many of Nature's most profound secrets through being able to circumnavigate the regions of space and go where mortal man had never before ventured.

His chum, whom he had known simply as Parachute Pete, was also a good fellow, plain of speech and absolutely without fear.

Pete was perfectly at home in all that pertained to his perilous business, but he lacked those commanding qualities possessed by Bob, and which promised to some day land him in the front rank of scientific men.

At any rate they made a wonderfully good team of performers, and their startling act created such a furore among the crowds attending the circus that they already had their salary been twice doubled by the proprietors in order to induce them to remain, but they refused utterly to be bound by a contract.

Bob had some curiously big ideas tucked away in the corners of his brain, and the time had about come when he felt that he was in a condition to ventilate them.

On this particular day the two chums were lounging in their dressing tent (which also served them for sleeping accommodations) and were discussing various matters in which they had so deep an interest.

The show had been going on all been unusually daring, and when the young athletes landed successfully with their twin parachutes Bob and Pete had been wafted to their ears from the distant fair grounds, even while waiting for the collapsed balloon close by.

Of course they felt a feeling elated, if weary, for the applause of the multitude is always gratifying to public performers, especially the young, and Pete was also prone to grow cynical.

Even such nomads as these parachute athletes may enjoy the pleasures of home, and while they lived under canvas during the course of their summer wanderings the interior of their house tent gave evidence of more or less solid comfort.

There was even a little oil stove upon which they were wont to cook their meals on such occasions when no hotel happened to be handy.

Tonight, however, they had dined sumptuously at a neighboring restaurant.

The air was unusually warm for Michigan, and on this account they could congratulate themselves upon shirking the necessity for a fire which would have rendered the atmosphere within the tent almost unbearable.

One accustomed to studying faces might have seen much that was thoughtful in that strong young countenance of Bachelor Bob.

Indeed, the boy had enough matters of weighty importance upon his mind to make him look serious.

There had always been a mystery connected with his past life, a something intangible in connection with his right to the name he bore, that had given him no peace ever since he was old enough to grasp its significance.

To be plain, Bob did not know who he was.

A stray, a waif cast upon the ocean of life, he had rubbed up against some tough propositions for one so young.

Naturally, the older he grew the fiercer burned that desire to learn whence he came and whom his parents were.

He had no romantic aspirations in the line of noble ancestors, not being given to reading stories that were apt to inflame the imagination.

Quite sufficient would poor Bob have thought it could he have found himself the son of respectable people.

What he wanted was just to know—to feel that he had a hold upon some one on this earth, and was not what he had always seemed to be, a particle belonging nowhere, abandoned by captain and crew, adrift on the high seas.

No one with a home to call his own, and a father and mother to care for him, can know the distress of mind this boy experienced during the long nights when he lay awake tossing on his brain searching the dark past for a clue that might lead him to a discovery.

More than once he had seemed on the point of grasping an intangible something, only to have it elude him into blankness.

Still, he did not wholly despair.

Such a sanguine temper abandon a fancy upon which the heart was set.

Though he rarely spoke of his mother to Pete, that good fellow's wholesome lad in secret sympathized with him.

Pete was a man of individual taste as to whether the knowledge of one's parentage brought anything like satisfaction.

Bibliography.

Secretly Pete was inclined to draw a veil over the unpleasantnesses of the past.

These included drunken brawls in the cheap dives where his tender years had been spent, and truth to tell, the lad's father had died in prison, having been convicted as savage encounter during which Pete's maternal ancestor was knocked on the head in a saloon.

However, Pete had known of boys who were in a position to feel some pride in their family relations and hence he entertained hopes that if Bob ever discovered his father's record he would not be in jail.

On this particular night the boys were not allowing themselves to think of these unpleasant features connected with their past.

They had reason to feel more or less satisfaction over their performance, a consumation of their hopes, toward which they had been looking forward for many weeks.

Nor was their elation unalloyed.

There hovered about them elements of trouble that were ominous.

Bob had made a bitter enemy in one Richard Dalton, a circus performer, even with the show, who claimed to be the champion bareback rider of the universe.

There seemed to have always been a natural antipathy between them, ever since meeting in the dressing tent.

Perhaps it had sprung from jealousy on the part of Dalton, who would not genuinely submit to a rival in his chosen field.

Bob could never fully understand his own feelings in the matter.

It seemed to him as though this man must in some way be connected with his past, though even although his better sense denounced this idea as absurd, it returned again and again to haunt him.

Dalton was another cause for bad blood between them.

The secret outline crept in.

In this case it was only a little girl who was the cause, and Pettie Barbara's hold upon the show bills; for this season she had been doing some very clever horseback riding in connection with the athletic signor.

He called her his child, but no one believed it, for she was blue-eyed and golden-haired, while he was swarthy and dark-complexioned, as far as anything could be seen of his face under the cosmetics he wore as the Calabrian count.

Bob had been strangely attracted toward Barbara, but the signor for some reason frowned upon their having intercourse, so that little boy knew of her past he had learned through Parachute Pete, who had evidently become well-known to the surly signor.

There was also another enemy for Bob, connected with the big show.

This was the acronaut under whose general direction the ascensions had been made, one Professor Baxter, who had long evinced the keenest jealousy toward the lad, and never hesitated to run him down as a young fool whose head had been badly swollen by reason of a few slight successes.

This old man of science was vindictive, and when Pete reported that several times he had seen him in earnest consultation with the Italian, he was safe to suspect there must be trouble brewing along the horizon.

"Never mind," said Bob cheerily, as he spread over a map of Michigan with the eager air of one who was laying out a course of travel, "we will give them all the good-by any day now. The show stays here a week because it's the best place in Michigan for crowds. And long before that time is up we will have flown."

His chum inwardly hardly looked around.

They had kept this matter a secret so long that somehow he had fallen into the way of believe it never was mentioned.

"You said you had made all arrangements for setting it up, Bob?" he asked timidly.

"Everything has been settled."

"Even to the gas?"

"Even to the gas."

"Bully! I don't know how I'm going to stand it from now on. Think of what a jolly trip it will be. And how we'll have the laugh on that dried up little old professor! Why, he won't be in the same class with Bob and Pete, balloonists! Parachutes and balloons are good enough for some fellows, but genius—that's us, Bob Sanders at higher things. Perhaps we'll make only one more tame ascent before a gaping crowd of country yahoos, and then, farewell!"

Pete stopped suddenly in his exultant glorification, for he had seen the companion make a movement of his hand to indicate that he had heard something was a secret listener to their conversation.

CHAPTER II.
THE MAN WHO LISTENED.

Pete knew what this signal meant.

More than once had they believed some one hovered around the entrance to their tent while they were engaged in discussing their ambitious plans which they entertained in connection with a balloon flight over the peninsula of Upper Michigan.

Pete became alert at once.

He reached out his hand and clutched some object that lay suspiciously near.

This proved to be a baseball bat, for the spirit of the national game had invaded the ranks of the circus, and on several occasions quite lively games had taken place.

So Pete wagged his head and winked his eye toward Bob, as he began to shift his position, edging toward the exit.

Bob, knowing that silence might alarm the eavesdropper, even if he were not already in retreat, continued to talk as though to his chum, and rattled the ball at times as if engaged in an earnest task.

He had his head raised, and his whole attitude was one of expectancy, for Pete had managed to crawl out of the tent, and there was a chance of "something doing" if he could but surprise the sneak at his job.

As the tents of the circus were close at hand, all sorts of subdued sounds could be heard did one take the trouble to listen—the cropping of the horses, the munching, the voices of canvas men over their supper, the gathering crowd for the evening performance, the noises connected with a big State fair—all these formed a babel of sound that was not unlike a chorus, or the growl of the surf upon the shore sands.

Suddenly the general clamor was punctuated by a shrill, discordant scream.

Bob sprang from his seat, for the canvas at one side of the tent was violently agitated.

Then came a second dull blow, followed by another outcry.

Pete broke out into a loud laugh, there were voices in contest all around, some gruff voices, a few hard words, and the canvas men, after which they joined in the hilarity.

"All over," said Bob, grinning amiably, "and I guess Pete hit him for fair that time. Perhaps he'll think it healthy to stay away from our tent after this, the sneak. Wonder who it was? Although it was something familiar in the voice, though it's more as though I should decreed so low. Hello! here's Pete again. So the conquering hero comes."

Pete also grinned as he cast the baseball bat upon the ground.

"Oh! what a beast. I fetched him the second time—just as he was bending over to get on his feet. I reckon he'll be a little stiff around the joints after tonight. It was a home run drive, all right, Bob," he said, laughing until he had to hold his sides.

"Served the cur right. What business had he to listen. I'm sorry I couldn't give him the toe of my boot, too. Did he run?"

"Did he run? Say, he just flew! Never knew what hit him, but was as scared as if lightning had struck him. And how he swore! Luckily, no one could understand a word, for it was in Italian," remarked the owner of the bat.

"What! do you think it was the signor?" exclaimed Bob, looking sober

"I couldn't see for sure, but the voice was his, and then the Italian swear words, who would speak that way but him?"

"We have Italians among the canvas men."

"None who can swear as smoothly as that scowling signor. For proof, watch him tomorrow. If I handed on him with that second whack, I bet you'll see a limp in his walk, all right. For the life of him, he can't help showing it," declared Pete, who seemed to consider the whole matter in the light of a joke, such was his carefree disposition.

Bob scented fresh trouble.

"If that was the revengeful signor you belted with that old wagon spoke, you can better believe he'll have it in for you, my boy, good and warm," he said, nodding his head seriously.

"Oh, well, I'll keep my eye on the dago and see that he gets no chance to meddle with the cords of our apparatus. I guess it wouldn't be very nice to find our parachutes no good when up half a mile, and going higher, to fall like lead when the hot air went out, eh, Bob?"

"Well, hardly. I don't hanker after such an experience, I tell you. But that fellow wouldn't hesitate at anything for revenge. These Italians all carry a stiletto. I've heard say. Take care about going around alone after dark, old fellow."

"That doesn't worry me as much as some other things, hang it," confessed Pete, ceasing to laugh.

"What are they?" asked his comrade, although he could himself give a good guess.

"Well, he must have heard us talking

It was the signor.

while he stands sentry. Now, if we're going to vamoose, the sooner we pack up and have our stuff carried over the better. When we're ready I'll get a wagon."

"You mean I will. It isn't safe for you to wander around after dark, my honorable friend. Some one has too warm a feeling for you, and cold steel comes cheap," said Bob in the convincing way his chum never disputed.

"All right. But to work here. Lucky for us we're used to sudden moves, and know how to pack our duffle in three shakes of a lamb's tail. Here goes then, old pard."

Pete was something of a hustler in everything he undertook—as his comrade said, there was not a lazy bone in his whole body, and when the spirit moved, he could accomplish wonders in a given time.

In less than half an hour their possessions had been packed away in the receptacles intended to hold the same.

Then the tent was struck.

Like all canvas connected with a traveling show, it was arranged for speedy flitting, and almost like magic it came down.

Some curiosity was evinced on the part of the hangers-on, but most of them knew the parachute athletes' liking for solitude, and supposed they had realized their mistake in placing their tent so near the stables and mess room, and were rectifying the error by a speedy move.

The boys were prime favorites with the rough canvas men, and when they rode away in the wagon with their outfit they sent back joking answers to the questions shouted after them.

"I'm afraid so."

"And we have away pretty much our whole secret. He knows we've got a balloon here in town, and mean to make an ascent any day now," continued Pete.

"It's too bad, but there's no doubt of it."

"And just as like as not the miserable dago, egged on by that jealous old Baxter, will find out where we keep the big gas bag, and slash it into ribbons with his knife. Wouldn't that be just like him, Bob, and for him from Missouri, you know, and I have to be told."

"That's no nature, sure pop. Looks like we won't have the clear sailing we expected, Peter. Clouds begin to rise and a storm may be brewing. If we could only cut loose and leave the old professor and his tool behind, we'd be all right. But somehow I'm afraid no such good luck is coming our way."

"Say, don't look on the blue side, Bob. Cheer up, old chap. I tell you we're bound to win out, in spite of these cuss that hang around and yap at our heels. Here's what we can do—just abandon the shack and take up our quarters in the yard where the big bag is stored."

"That's all right, but how about the time we're going up each day? You can bet if any dirty work is on tap that's when they'll try to bring it about. Am I right, Peter?" asked the other, folding the map and stowing it away in a small bag that seemed to hold various things useful to the daring voyager of the clouds.

"Correct, my boy, but I know the man to leave in charge while we're away, and you can rest easy there'll be no damage done. On the outskirts of the town was an enclosed yard connected with a cottage.

Here their tent went up again, close beside a large canvas package that seemed to contain something of value, to judge from the secure manner of its packing.

The owner of the cottage assisted them to get things to rights with considerable enthusiasm, for as he was in their secret he entered into the spirit of the game.

Besides, in the eyes of the average layman there was much to arouse curiosity in the strange belongings of these daring lads, who daily risked their lives upon the trapeze a thousand feet in the air, and their performance ended, sailed back to solid earth with their twin parachutes like a pair of feathers at the mercy of the wind.

CHAPTER III.

THE HIGHEST BREEZE IN THE WORLD.

This was the date of their last ascent, according to the engagement with the Sanders Brothers.

In vain had the great showmen pleaded with them to continue, offering a still further increase of salary as an inducement.

Balloon Bob could not be moved.

Their under-studies must hereafter cope with the front, for a time at least, and do to the best they knew how with hot-air balloon and twin parachutes.

"Perhaps," said Bob, finally, "when we have made our balloon flight, we may return and finish the season with you, sir; but remember, I'm making no promises. Besides, to tell you the truth, it isn't any too healthy for us here since we've made enemies of the signor and Baxter. We don't fancy the Italian, and for one I wouldn't put it past him to do us a bad turn—meddle with our apparatus, so that we couldn't come down with our wings, but must sail on into the clouds and finally drop a mile like two stones. Yes, we feel safer away, sir."

The circus man even went so far as to say he would immediately get rid of both the objectionable characters (for he already knew in secret that the signor and Baxter were about to quit), but Bob only laughed.

Sorry, Mr. Sanders, but our minds are made up on this matter. We have our balloon here in town, and it's good-by for us as soon as things look favorable."

So matters rested on this afternoon when the two gymnasts were hooked to ascend for the last time on their flying trapeze.

Bob, remembering what he had himself said about the revengeful nature of the Italian, carefully examined and tested every bit of the apparatus connected with the hot air balloon, together with the twin parachutes, even going into those that later were in condition to break loose at the proper time.

He was relieved to find things in perfect condition, for it had worried him a bit when the attendant confessed that the signor had been present with Professor Baxter that morning, while the old geezer-man overhauled the apparatus connected with his department, for he still had the balloon business under his charge.

Pete vowed the signor meant mischief.

"Yes, everything again just before we go up, partner," he said in a low tone, as the men were inflating the balloon with hot air; "I wouldn't put it past the old villain to soak a rope in some acid that would eat it apart after a certain time. I don't want to collect my life insurance money yet."

Bob felt pretty much the same way, and again carefully went over every inch of rope, every strap and catch.

"Nothing doing, eh?" asked Pete, for the time had come to ascend, and a vast concourse of eager patrons had gathered inside the fair grounds.

"Can't find a thing wrong. Guess we did our friend an injustice that time. He must have had a good laugh to see how nervous we were looking at every little joint. Well, buck up now, my boy. They've waiting for us to give the signal. This is our last exhibition—we ought to outdo all others," said Bob.

"And we will. Tomorrow, when they see those two greenies perform the crowd will laugh and call it a joke. Neither of 'em has the heart of a mouse, and will never be a shining mark as a good gymnast. I'm all ready when you are, Bob."

"Then here we go!"

Balloon Bob made a signal to the men.

Well trained, they immediately let go of the ropes that held the great hot air bag down.

It shot straight upward with a rush, the two trapeze performers being seated in their respective bars, for up until they had reached a certain distance were they to go through with those amazing exhibitions of daring and skill that always caused hearts to turn cold with apprehension.

At a signal from Balloon Bob up from the great throng as the balloon carried the parachute boys toward the sky.

Your Credit is Good with Us

So Write Today for Our 4 Big FREE Catalogs

Marvelous Bargain "Peoples" Special Brass Rail Iron Bed only $5.95

75 Cents down and 75 Cents Month — Price only $5.95

"It's Easy to Pay the Peoples Way"

Three 13 Challenge Bargains are sample of $5000 values. You can order any article seen here on Credit—No Security—No Interest—Absolutely confidential. Do your shopping now in High-Grade Homefurnishings, Furniture, Carpets, Rugs, etc. Our low prices and easy terms mean big savings.

4 Handsome Illustrated CATALOGS FREE

Biggest credit catalogs in the world—send to-day—full of values to astonish—strive to save from $100 to $500 you'll like. You pay only 75c down on each $5 worth you order. $10 your monthly payment at rate of 75 cents per week. Sent on request. Write today for Catalogs.

$5000 Gold on deposit protects you. We're reliable—established 18 years. Write today for Catalogs.

Peoples Outfitting Co., 202 Sixth Street, Detroit, Mich.

$5.25 20 Year Guarantee

STEM SET

THE ENGINE SPECIAL

Patented 23 JEWELED ADJUSTED Watch

Regret is universal, and a perfect timekeeper is not. Adjusted to five positions, and a perfect timekeeper is not. Heavy guaranteed 20-year gold-filled case. Handsomely engraved and polished. Stem wind and set. Genuine 23 jewel adjusted 6/0 movement. Fully guaranteed 25 Years, both case and works.

SEEING IS BELIEVING. Send for this watch on approval. If you are not entirely satisfied when it arrives, return it and we will refund your money and pay the return charges. Don't send a penny. Just your name and address on a postal card and the watch is yours. A request on business stationery will do equally well. Write today.

H. E. CHALMERS & CO., 626 Dearborn St., Chicago.

Free THIS CAMERA AND OUTFIT!

With one year's subscription to

THE CHICAGO LEDGER

CAMERA TAKES PICTURES TWO INCHES BY TWO INCHES IN SIZE

PICTURES EASILY MADE WITH THIS DEVELOPING AND PRINTING OUTFIT

This King Camera reaches you ready for use. You can finish your own pictures with the complete outfit sent with it. Outfit includes plates, trays, printing paper and all the necessary chemicals as shown in the illustration.

To secure Camera and Outfit Free send $1.00 for one year's subscription to The Chicago Ledger. You get this great paper every week for a year for the dollar, and you get this photo outfit absolutely free, all charges prepaid, if you subscribe now. Canadian subscription price, $1.50 per year.

Send to W. D. BOYCE CO., Boyce Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

$4.95 MEN'S FINE SUIT AND EXTRA TROUSERS

We make and sell more pure cotton underwear and hose than any other factory in the world. 1,500 styles; sold at fifty mail stores. Guaranteed as to fit, each one; also to wear and perfect satisfaction, or your money back. Send for free booklet, Fashions, Latest Ideas, Best Values and Prices. Address Dept. 1

The Suit is Finished

Exactly as illustrated. Fine black cheviot, fancy silk mixed, Italian cloth, or fancy worsted, in any style. Made in the best manner. Perfect fitting, and tailored and guaranteed during one year. Sizes 34 to 44 breast measure.

The Free Trousers

which we give with the suit at the above price are made of fancy cheviot worsted, in any style. Finely tailored and perfect fitting. The celebrated Oxford cut, and splendid clothing otherwise. Sizes 28 to 42 waist measure.

Send $1.00 deposit, and we will send the suit and trousers by express for examination. If you find them equal to any $15.00 suit or pair of trousers you ever saw, send balance of $3.95 and they are yours. If not entirely satisfactory after examination, return them and we will send the $1.00 back. Write for our free catalogue containing 1,500 styles of samples of clothing, hats, furnishings, shoes, trunks, etc., from which you can order anything you want, and save from 25 to 50 per cent. Mailed free upon request.

JOHN M. SMYTH CO. Madison Street CHICAGO

GREENBACKS Pack of $1,310 Int'l Confederate Money, Genuine, Different, Obsolete Issues, 10c. Send for a pack & share the Boys with a Wall paper agency. C. A. Bisbee, Box 84, Utica, N. Y.

Spanish Needles, Hole Goldsmiters for Jewelers, Engravers, Watchmakers, Gunsmiths. Our Instruments are the best. Cat. 2 cents. Wilcox Supply Co., 114 Nassau St., New York City.

MAKE MONEY BY RAISING POULTRY. Pleasant and Profitable Work. We will teach you by mail, poultry farming, system complete, explained, with yearly subscription to COMMERCIAL POULTRY, all for 15c; 3 months, 25c. Address Dept. 83, Commercial Poultry Publishing Company, Hacroille, Ill.

MORPHINE FREE TRIAL TREATMENT

Opium and all drug habits. Painless. Permanent Home Cure. New Method. Whether you are fully restored to their normal condition. A full trial treatment sent free. Write for it. Write in confidence. ST. PAUL ASSOCIATION, Suite 1201-05 Van Buren St., Chicago.

"PERSONAL"

Any lady or gentleman wishing to correspond with the opposite sex, with a view to matrimony, should write at once to us. We have a large list of persons wishing to correspond. We introduce you by mail. Many prominent matrimonial and social friends are arranged through us. Everything strictly confidential. We refer to the press. Please write stamp for reply and mention this paper. Lock Box 311, Correspondence Club, Chicago, Ill.

OUR PRIZE IS ELGIN, WALTHAM

HAMPDEN, ILLINOIS, HOWARD, ROCKFORD, SOUTH BEND, RAILROAD WATCHES

Gold Filled Case, Guaranteed 20 Years, Stem Wind and Stem Set, Open Face or Hunting, Screw Back and Bezel, Screw Case, Dust Proof, Solid Nickel Movement, Genuine Elgin, Waltham, Hampden, Illinois, Howard, Rockford, South Bend or Railroad Watch, Adjusted to Heat, Cold, Isochronism and Positions, Sapphire Jewels, Expansion Balance, Jewel Set Safety Pinion, Quick Train, Compensation Balance, Patent Lever Escapement, Fancy Dial, Ruby Pallets, Ruby Roller, Ruby Escapement, Ruby Pivots, Ruby Jewels, Ruby Balance Staff, Ruby Pallet Staff, Ruby Escapement Wheel, Ruby Roller Jewel, Ruby Pallet Jewel, Ruby Balance Jewel, Ruby Escapement Pinion, Ruby Pallet Pinion, Ruby Roller Pinion, Ruby Balance Pinion, Ruby Escapement Jewel, Ruby Pallet Jewel, Ruby Roller

THE MISGUIDED WIFE.

BY HENRY PERCIVAL.

Bob Peterson was a fireman, and his expertness in handling horses made him the driver of Engine No. 44. He had a wife and one child, and they were the idols of his heart.

Now we behold him as he comes whistling along the sunlit street. Tall, bulky, proud in his manhood and power, with straight-glancing eyes, square-set shoulders, and the bronze of health upon his regular features—he swung carelessly toward his humble home.

Bob Peterson was chuckling to himself in secret enjoyment of the surprise and pleasure he intended springing on his little wife.

In his big right hand he held a small, neat parcel. In the packet was a brooch. The brooch had just been purchased with some of his hard-earned savings. But, arriving at his residence, he went whistling up the stairs, pushed open the door of his sitting-room, and gave a loud "Hello, you dear, you!" then glanced round in surprise, his face lengthening in disappointment.

The room was empty—save for the child in its cradle—the table was not yet laid for tea, though the meal-time was passed by a quarter of an hour.

On the table lay a letter. Bob picked it up. It was addressed to him, and in his wife's handwriting. Some of the light in his eyes, some of the ruddiness in his cheeks, died as he noticed the unusual thing. The fire burned gray, and the room seemed to have a shadow in it.

"How strange!" laughed Bob, and he tore the envelope open with eager and trembling hands. Then, all at once, over and over him, a lump seemed to arise between his shoulders as he bowed his head, and sweat burst out on his forehead, and tears fell from his eyes, as he read:

"Husband, forgive me. For the love of our child, forget me. Cling to the little one, who is pure and innocent, and thrust me from your memory. I can never look you in the face again as a faithful wife. I am unworthy, unworthy. I dare not ask God's blessing, but I hope I dare pray for your forgetfulness and happiness.

"MARY."

The letter shook in Bob's hand and fell to the floor. Something set a light to Bob's heart and touched it in a moment; and then left it cold and crumpled, like ashes.

In a moment he was a terribly transformed man. Mechanically he opened the packet, dropped the brooch, and ground it beneath his heel. He did this without any show of passion. A volley of oaths, a rush of tears, the wild gestures of despair and grief and wrath would have been far less frightening and ominous than this white beat of passion, that yet seemed so cool.

"Who's the man?" muttered Bob, and all the melody and richness had gone out of his tones, leaving them harsh and thick and dry, like the tones of a drunkard on his awakening. "Who's the man? Let me know his name! Point him out to me, God! Let me strangle him, stamp on his face, disfigure him after life is out of him! Tell me his name! Tell me his hiding place!"

Just then the baby cried in his crib, and Bob passed over to him.

"Youngster," he said, in a strange, far-away voice, "you and I are a pair of deserted, wronged 'uns. We never did her a harm, we never thought her anything but pure. But she's ruined us, disgraced us, you and me! She's got to be punished; she'll get to be punished. There are two of us to be avenged; there are two lives to be taken. Just listen to what I swear."

He took the baby from its crib and held it to the window, and toward the sun, whose cold, wintry light was now streaming in upon them. He was so quiet in his actions, so still and collected in every move, that the little one, after a feeble cry, fell once again into slumber, and continued its dreams with a smile upon its lips.

"God!" exclaimed Peterson, looking straight at the sun, as though he addressed Him, "I am an honest man, and this little one in my arms is the offspring of an honest union. Today we are disgraced, and through no fault of our own. The Good Book says, 'An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth.' So be it. I hope for salvation, as I hope for my baby's salvation, I swear to kill them both! It will be a just and holy act. If I fail to perform what I have sworn, may my child follow in the footsteps of its mother, and my own limbs find no no other deathbed to lie upon than the pavements of the streets, or the bed of the river. So help me God!"

Then he put the baby back in its crib, and mused silently with his face in his hands. He had pledged himself before God to become a murderer, and, failing his oath, he had called down upon his own and his child's head the most dreadful consequences.

"A murderer's child!" he gasped hoarsely; "but it is to be, so help me God!"

And at the thought the fire-alarm bell rang out distinct and clear. In a moment he was alert, eager and ready for any call of duty. Passing the baby to a kindly-disposed neighbor, he hastened to reach the engine-house. The horses were already beside the engine-shaft, and in an instant Bob bounded to the driver's seat.

A few moments later the engine was clattering along the noisy streets, which were thronged with pedestrians.

Bob drove furiously. The pace and pain suited his mood, it made him forget. He shouted louder than any of the pedestrians, because his tones dulled and deadened his aching heart. He laughed boisterously when he whipped the wheel off a hansom cab—it was cut off as neatly as a slice from a pat of butter—nor did he feel the slight, fat compunction at the destruction of a fruit-stand, that split up and scattered before his mad rush.

On, on, through the crowd and lights and mass of traffic that spumed on either side and opened a frightened passage for his foam-flecked team.

On, on, through wide thoroughfares, round sharp corners, pitting over pavement edges, and spattering mud and scattering sparks, and communicating a wild whirl of excitement to everything and every one he passed. A splendid tonic for a dull and brooding mind; swiftness, rattle, roar, excitement and forgetfulness.

And now the flames are in sight. Now the smoke grows stifling. Now the crackle of burning wood and the thunder of falling masonry add to the riot and the uproar. Now the crowd is so thick that it seems impossible to avert a catastrophe in steering through them.

A bump, and then a scream.

The front wheels, passing over something soft, made the engine swerve. Another bump, and then a groan. The back wheels pass over some obstruction, making the engine swerve.

A rush of men and women, a curse or two from the mass, a cry of "Poor devils, they're done for!" and Bob Peterson pulls up his horses in view of the flames.

When the house was a smoking cinder, and no longer formidable, a policeman touched Bob on the shoulder.

"Driver," said he, "come this way. You've done for a man and his wife this night. They're lying dead at the hospital! We must have your name."

Bob remembered the two bumps.

Something—something he could not analyze—set his heart throbbing wildly. He followed the policeman. The hospital was close at hand. He was taken down a long passage, and presently stood in a room cold and comfortless, and pregnant with the undefinable steminess of death.

Two human beings lay stretched out under the rays of a gaslight. Cloths were over their faces, as Bob Peterson entered the room. The cloths were removed, disclosing the features of a man and a woman, scenes of countenance, as is usually the case with those suddenly bereft of life. Each wore a placid expression—save of whiteness—the eyes of both seemed to be looking up at the gas jet.

Bob took one look at the woman—and gasped! He knew her at once!

He looked at the man—and thought an oath. He knew him as an old comrade, whom he had thought a friend.

"The fates!" he pondered, as he staggered home. "God's finger in in this. God made me do what I swore to do—and there's not a drop of guilty blood on my soul. I shall not be afraid now to meet the little one. I shall not be afraid now to think lovingly and forgivingly of my poor misguided girl, thank God!"

The Juryman's Excuse.

A droll story is told of a juryman who outwitted a judge, and that without telling an untruth. He ran breathlessly into the court.

"O, your honor, if you can excuse me, pray do. I don't know which will die first—my wife or my daughter!"

"Dear me, that's sad," said the innocent judge. "Certainly, you are excused."

The next day the juryman was met by one of his fellow-jurors, who in a sympathetic voice asked:

"How's your wife?"

"She's all right. Why do you ask?"

"And your daughter?"

"She's all right, too. Why do you ask?"

"Why yesterday, you told the judge that you did not know which would die first."

"Now do I. That is a problem that time alone can solve."

Usually a man who doubts the truthfulness of the Bible has unlimited faith in a patent medicine almanac.

FREE---6 STYLISH PATTERNS---FREE

We will send any six of these fashionable, up-to-date patterns ABSOLUTELY FREE with one year's subscription to THE CHICAGO LEDGER. These patterns are from the latest Paris designs. They make being stylishly dressed economical.

One year's subscription to the LEDGER costs only one dollar. You get this fine family story paper every week for a year for the dollar, and you get six of these fashion patterns FREE, by subscribing now.

Select any six patterns—send the number and size of each, with one dollar to

PATTERN DEPT., CHICAGO LEDGER, CHICAGO, ILL.

Subscription for Canada $1.50 per year.

5622 SEVEN GORED SKIRT 24 TO 32 WAIST
5627 BOYS' OVERALLS 4 TO 8 YEARS
5619 FIVE GORED PETTICOAT 22 TO 32 WAIST
5626 CHILDS DRESS 2, 4 AND 6 YEARS
5645 MISSES' CHEVERELLE COAT 14 AND 16 YEARS
5651 GIRLS' JUMPER DRESS WITH GUIMPE 4 TO 10 YEARS
5617 FIVE GORED SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST
5643 BLOUSE OR SHIRT WAIST 32 TO 44 BUST
5645 OVER BLOUSE WITH GIRDLE 32 TO 40 BUST
5632 BOYS' BLOUSE SUIT 6 TO 12 YEARS
5633 FITTED JACKET 36 TO 46 BUST
5636 GIRLS' DRESS 6 TO 12 YEARS
5620 SHIRT WAIST OR BLOUSE 32 TO 42 BUST
5612 BOYS' BLOUSE 4 TO 12 YEARS
5477 OVER BLOUSE OR JUMPER 32 TO 42 BUST
5634 FANCY YOKE BLOUSE 32 TO 42 BUST
5693 PRINCESSE JUMPER GOWN 32 TO 40 BUST
5641 CORSET COVER 34 TO 44 BUST
5628 GIRLS' COAT 4 TO 12 YEARS
5675 CAPE ETON 34 TO 42 BUST
5582 TUCKED FLOUNCE SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST
5657 GIRLS' DRESS 8 TO 14 YEARS
5624 ONE-PIECE KIMONO SMALL, MEDIUM, LARGE
5676 NINE GORED PLAITED SKIRT 22 TO 30 WAIST

A FINE
Deafness Treatment
FREE

Do you realize the terrible fate which it staring you in the face? Do you know what total Deafness means? It means a living death. Shut out from all human intercourse, the world of business and pleasure, life becomes a fearful blank.

Will you suffer this untold misery and loneliness when you may have your full sense of hearing, quick and acute? I have rescued thousands from Deafness. I can restore YOU, if you come before it is too late.

Because I have been so successful in curing Deafness and head noises by the use of my Electric Ear Oil, I am going to GIVE AWAY a free treatment for Deafness to every sufferer who asks for it. Surely this is a present worth having. Out of my sincere desire to relieve human suffering, I will send a full treatment to either of you, free of charge, and gladly make you this offer. My treatments has cured thousands of people of the most distressing, wearing head-noises and restored their full perfect hearing. Write for the treatment to-day and give me the opportunity to show how YOU CAN BE CURED, RIGHT IN YOUR OWN HOME.

All I ask is that you will act Now. Don't hesitate or it may be too late to help you. My success has been great, and applicants for treatment are many, so that I can only make this offer a short time. Remember this treatment for Deafness is given to you without any charge whatever. It is absolutely free. Send off now, in the mail, a post card or letter request with your name and address upon it, and I will send you the free treatment for Deafness.

DEAFNESS SPECIALIST SPROULE,
306 Trade Building, Boston, Mass.

TAPE-WORM EXPELLED WITH HEAD, GUARANTEED in two hours; no fasting required. Booklet free. Dr. E. M. Lawrence, Philadelphia, Pa.

DETECTIVES Shrewd, reliable men wanted in every county to work under orders; no experience necessary. Write H. C. Webster, Indianapolis, Ind.

YOUR TOTTLING TOOT FREE. Send address to PROF. HAMILTON, Dept. 6, STRATFORD, Conn.

LADIES OR SCHOOLGIRLS each town, $1 day copying advertising letters; no canvassing; steady work; send stamp for particulars. Address, with 2c. stamp, NEEDLE CO., Shawbortville, N. B.

A SONG "HIT" will make you rich. Send us your poem. Cash or Royalty for available manuscript. WASHBURN MUSIC CORPORATION, Washington, D. C.

ANY MOTHER SENDING ME ADDRESSES of five or more children interested in infants' clothing will receive some pretty patterns for dressing their tootsies. Address BOX 249, YONKERS, N. Y.

TIES EASY to WEAR! EASY to FIT! EASY to GET! We have the only Ties that can be worn by everyone with perfect comfort. Sizes, Lengths where all others fail. Send for free booklet. The Easy Tries Co., Kalamazoo, Mich.

TRUSS

OPIUM or Morphine Habit cured. Free trial treatment. We specialize only on this habit. Write us. DR. J. C. HOFFMAN'S SANITARIUM, Box 110, La Porte, Ind.

CALIFORNIA LAND Near new, bargain outline guaranteed; 2½ acres, more or less, $200 cash, $10 monthly; clear, ready to plow; under irrigation; perpetual water right; immediate possession given; particulars, maps, photographs free. Address, quick, STEVINSON COLD LAND CO., 64 The Mutual Bldg., San Francisco, Cal.

WANTED Men to learn barber trade. Splendid pay after few weeks' study; constant demand; special inducements this season. Write nearest branch, Moler System of Colleges: Moler, 39 Lake St., Chicago, Ill.; 39, Moler, Moler, Moler